

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

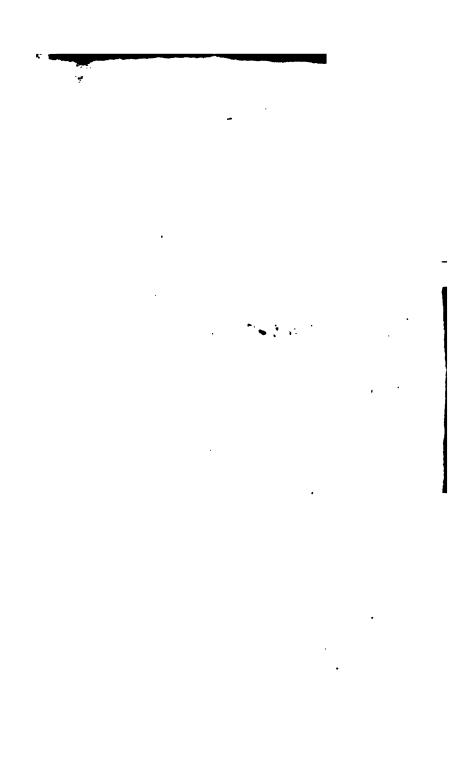

About Google Book Search

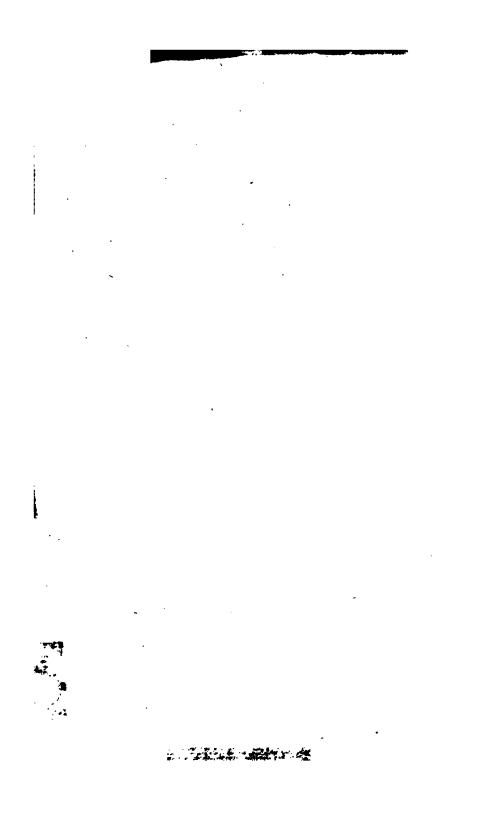

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

Thus. BiM. III.

•

THE

MODERN PART

OF AN

Universal History,

FROM. THE Earliest Account of TIME.

Compiled from

ORIGINAL WRITERS.

By the Authors of the Antient Part.

VOL. XXXVI.

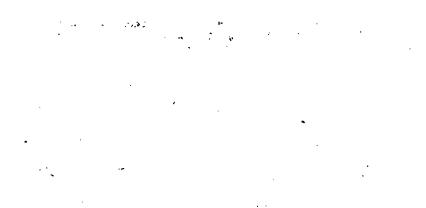

L O N D O N:

Printed for T. OSBORNE, C. HITCH, A. MILLAR, JOHN RIVINGTON, S. CROWDER, B. LAW and Co. T. LONGMAN, and C. WARE.

M.DCC.LXII.

223 / 181

Modern History:

BEINGA

CONTINUATION

OF THE

Universal History.

History of the TUSCAN STATES.

SECT. I.

Containing a Description of Tuscany, including Florence, Pisa, Leghorn, Sienna, Stato de gli Presidii, Patrimony of the Church, Lucca, and the twelve ancient Tuscan Cities.

HE grand dutchy of Tuscany, as it is now called, Description excepting a sew detached pieces lying in the ter-of Tuscitories of Modena, Genoa, and Lucca, extends cany. from North to South about one hundred and sixteen miles, and about eighty from East to West. It is bounded by the Mediterranean, or Tuscan Sea; by the ecclesiastical state; by the dutchy of Modena, and the country which anciently formed the exarchate of Ravenna; and it naturally abounds with grain, lemons, oranges, all other struits, oil, and wine of an excellent kind. The sace of the country is beautifully variegated by hills and dales, and the soil so rich and sertile, that it requires but little culture. It must however be admitted, that many places in Tuscany are altered for the worse, since the decadence of the Roman Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

Z

empire. Its populousness made it then the natural glory of Italy; but being depopulated by the irruptions of barbarians, the want of cultivation has rendered some of the lowlying places, particularly about Pifa, Volterra, Chiufi, and Massa, unhealthy.

TUSCANY abounds in mines and minerals; but skill is wanting to work them in some places, particularly at Volterra. Its falt-works, however, are in good order; and alabaster, fulphur, and chalcedony are found in many places 2. Massa produces lapis lazuli and borax: amethysts are found at Pionibino: juspers at Barga: black flate, iron ore, excellent marble, and cornelians, at Stazzena and Seravezza. Quickfilver is found in the neighbourhood of Sevegliani; and even mines of filver have been discovered near Galena. Other places of this delightful country produce allum, manna, and honey, all excellent in their kinds. The hot springs of Tuscany were choaked up by the barbarians. The famous counters Matilda in 1113, repaired and made use of them; but the fucceeding ages of barbarism again choaked them, till about twenty years ago they were discovered at the foot of mount St. Guiliano, not far from Pisa, and being again rebuilt, they are at this time vallly frequented for their medicinal virtues. Other places of Tuscany are famous on the same account; but each spring differs from another in its quality, appearance, and degrees of heat or cold. The same may be said of the baths, many of which in Tuscany are esteemed of fingular efficacy in the cure of diseases.

THE Arno is the principal river in this country. It receives into it the Sieva, the Pefa, and the Elfa, and falls into the sea a little below Pisa. The source and course of the duke.

Ombrone is through the Siennese.

THOUGH the modern Tuscany does not comprehend the revenue of whole of the ancient Etruria, yet its great duke is a sovereign the great prince, and a powerful one too, especially in Italy. He is grand-master of the order of St. Stephen, the privileges of which somewhat resemble those of Malta: his ordinary income amounts to about three millions of piastres a year. His militia is regimented; his standing army confists of two regiments of dragoons, and three regiments of foot; but, upon occasions, it is said that he can bring into the field thirty thousand men, and fit out twenty thips of war, besides gallies and galleatles. The whole dutchy is now governed by a regency, at the head of which is a governor, who refides at Plorence, and lives with great magnificence. It is certain, that during the prefent war in Germany the great duke has drawn confiderable supplies of men from his Tustan dominions, and they are reckoned inferior to few of the *Ger*man troops.

^{*} English Translation of Busching's Geography, vol. iii. pag. 118.

A. D. 1762.

THE chief district of Tuscany is that of Florence, where the Florence. excellent genius of the inhabitants for agriculture, notwithstanding the disadvantages they lie under in point of government and liberty, has rendered their country almost a gar-Fiorence itself, the capital of Tuscany, is delightfully structed in the midth of fertile well cultivated hills and vallies. and divided by the Arno, which has there over it four stone bridges, into two unequal parts. The streets are paved with very broad stones, that look like fragments of polished rocks. so that they are generally clean: many of them, however, are crooked, and so narrow as not to afford room for a carrisge to pass. The cities of Rome, Genoa, and Turin, excel Florence in the number and splendid appearance of their palaces, the beauty of those of Florence being greatly diminished by the paper windows which are every where in use. Florence is said to contain seventeen market-places, seven sountains, fix columns, two pyramids, one hundred and fixty public statues, forty-four parish churches, thirty-seven hospitals and charitable foundations, twelve priories, fifty four convents, and twenty-four ecclefiastical fraternities. The number of the houses is computed to be nine thousand, and that of the inhabitants seventy thousand. The present trade of Florence, besides the produce of the ground, lies in its manufactures of woollen and filk stuffs, which are carried on by the principal citizens, even the nobility here not disdaining to be traders, and sometimes shopkeepers. The Florentines booft greatly of their Academia della Crusca; a society of learned men, instituted for purifying their language, as metals are purified by the crucible. In the year 1753, an academy of agriculture, confifting of one hundred persons, was instituted at Florence, and owed its original to the abbot Ubaldo Montelatici.

The city of Florence itself, next to Rome, is, with regard to antiquities and curiosities, the best worthy of a stranger's visiting of any in Italy. Its archiepiscopal cathedral is said to be half as large again as St. Pan's at London; and some of its palaces yield to none in Italy. Several of its churches and public buildings are likewise extremely magnificent. The thapel of San Lorenzo, though it makes no great appearance on the outside, will, if ever it is sinished in the manner it has been begun, be by far the finest in the world. Its works were carried on without interruption from 1604 to the death of the last great duke of the house of Medici in 1737. But it is not our purpose to dwell on the particulars of this and the other celebrated structures in Florence. It would however be unpardonable to omit mentioning the old ducal palace, which contains the greatest and finest collection made by one family, and within one roof, in the world, of ancient and modern sculpture, painting, and curiosities of every kind, both natural and artificial. In an octagonal room of this palace stands the celebrated statue of Venus, called by way of excellency the Venus of Medici, of ancient Greek sculpture, with many others of equal merit. This palace contains likewise in it an immense quantity of plate and jewels, ancient and modern; and Florence is celebrated for several excellent libraries.

İί

Pifa.

THE territory of Pisa, the next Tuscan state, affords all the comforts of life. Its cattle and vegetables are very fine, and it produces plenty of corn and wine. The city of Pisa, like Florence, is divided by the Arno into two parts; but tho' very spacious and extensive, it does not contain at present above fixteen or feventeen thousand inhabitants, though formerly they were computed at one hundred and fifty thousand. Pisans, when free, were a commercial people, and extremely tenacious of their liberties. The form of their government was republican; and the wars between them and the Florentines, who at last subdued them, were long and bloody. The conveniency of their fituation and harbour for the feveral powers who had claims or territories in Italy, was the reason why, after they had lost their independency as a people, they never could recover it; and with their independency their Their neighbourhood to Leghorn, importance dwindled. which is now the chief port in the Mediterranean, tho' formerly of little or no note for trade, has likewise contributed greatly to the decay of Pisa, which is now remarkable for little more than the shells of its ancient magnificent buildings, it being the place where the gallies are built, and the residence of the knights of St. Stephen. Between Pisa and Legborn is a canal fixteen Italian miles in length.

Leghorn.

LEGHORN, or Liverno, lies within the ancient district of Pisa. It stands in a marshy country, which, with the affishance of canals cut at a vast expence, is now cultivated, though the air is unwholsome, and water scarce. The city is well fortified, and contains forty thousand inhabitants, half of whom are Jews, who, notwithstanding the heavy taxes they pay, are rich, and carry on a vast trade. Leghern is a free free port, and to this freedom the greatness of its commerce is owing. It has two harbours, the outward and the inward: the latter contains the duke's gallies, and the other trading thips; but thips of great burthen must lie out of the mole which forms the harbour, moored to pillars and large iron The light-house of Leghorn contains thirty lamps burning in one lanthorn, and standing on a single rock in the sea; it is equally curious as useful. Aqua and Vada likewise lie within the district of Pisa; but their soil and air is so unwholesome, that they are very thinly inhabited.

THE district of Sienna is the third in Tuscany. The Sien- Sienna. nefe, like the other Tuscan states, were once siee, and struggled hard for their liberties, but are now subject to the grand duke. The city of Sienna is pleasantly situated in a wholesome air, and of large circumference, though its inhabitants are not in number above seventeen thousand. They are however noted for their politeness and elegance, many of the Tuscan nobility chusing Sienna for their residence; and it is thought that the Italian tongue is spoken here in its greatest purity. It is an archiepiscopal see, and its Gathic cathedral is crusted within and without with marble. Its pavement is extremely curious, and well preserved; but the university, which was founded here by Charles V. is on the decay, though the Jesuits college contains a good number of The great dukes of Tuscany have indulged the inhabitants in retaining some forms of their republican constitution, though the spirit of it is abolished.

THE district of Sienna is large, and great part of it, especially that which is called the Maremma di Sienna, and which runs seventeen Italian miles along the sea-coast, is unhealthy and thinly inhabited. It contains however several bishoprics, and a confiderable number of castles, forts, towns, and villages. Monte Pulciano, and Monte Alcino, though both bishoprics, are small places, but famous for their wines.

THE State de gli Presidii, Iring on or near to the sea-coast, Stato de confifts of a chain of forts, and formerly belonged to the Sien-gli Prenele; but is now subject to the king of the Two Sicilies. The fidii. most considerable place it contains is Orbitello, which is firongly fortified, and has a good harbour. Piombino, which makes a figure in the following history, stands on a rock in the sea; but, though it has a citadel and a palace, it is now an inconsiderable place. Porto Longone is a small fortified port; and Porto Ferraio, a fortification likewise, belongs to the great duke of Tuscany. The other fortified places in this siftrict are Telamone, Monte Argentaro, Porto Ercole, Monte

The History of the Tuscan States.

Filippo, and Porto St. Stefano. All which are mentioned in history, both ancient and modern.

THE churches patrimony, part if not all of which lies within the antient Etruria, or Tuscany, is bounded on the North by the Venetian territory; on the East by the Adriatic; on the South-east by the kingdom of Naples; on the South by the Mediterranean; and on the West by the grand dutchy of Tuscany and the Modenese. Its extent from North to South is about two hundred and forty miles. Its greatest from South-west to North-east is one hundred and twenty English miles, and its smallest about twenty.

A DESCRIPTION of the papal dominions, a small part of patrimony. which is confidered as belonging to the modern Tuscany, does not come within our present design. It is sufficient to say, that the state of the church is naturally one of the richest and most powerful in Italy, and the revenues would be immense, were it not for the oppressions of its government, which appropriates the labour of the poor inhabitants to itfelf; so that nothing but idleness and wretchedness, excepting among the Bolognese, who still retain some of their ancient privileges, is to be seen through the whole. The cause of this misery is, that the popes, who at the time of their election are advanced in years, generally give their dominions up to be preyed on by their rapacious needy relations, who, considering the short remainder of their kinsman's, life, make the most of them.

Lucca.

LUCCA is the only state in Tuscany that can be said to have preserved, or rather recovered, its liberties, and the bleffings of freedom are discernable all over the republic. Though no more than thirty Italian miles in circumference, it contains, besides the city of Lucca, one hundred and fifty The number of inhabitants are computed at one hundred and twenty thousand, and the soil is improved to the utmost. This little territory is bounded towards the Southwest by the Tuscan Sea; and on the land side it is in a manner inclosed, all but a small tongue that stretches to Modena, by the grand-dutchy of Tuscany.

THE government of the republic is lodged in a gonfalonier, whose power is much the same with that of the doges of Venice and Genoa. He is affisted by nine counsellors; but the power of all the ten continues but for two months, during which time they live in the state palace, and at the public expence. They are chosen out of the great council, which confifts of two hundred and forty nobles; but even this council is changed by a new election every two years.

The History of the Tuscan States.

The revenues of the republic are about four hundred thousand scudi or crowns, out of which they maintain five hundred men by way of regular force, and seventy Swist, as a guard to their acting magistrates.

THE fituation of the city of Lucca is in a plain, terminaring in most delightful eminences, adorned with villas, summer houses, corn-fields, and plantations of every kind; so that nothing either for use or pleasure is here wanting. The city, which is three Italian miles in circumference, has regular well-lined fortifications; and its streets, though irregular, are wide, well paved, and full of handsome houses. The number of its inhabitants are computed to be above forty thousand; and they carry on large manusactures, chiefly of filk stuffs. Lucca has a bishop, who enjoys several extraordinary priviliges; and its cathedral is Gaihic.

TUSCANY was formerly famous for its twelve cities; the Thetavelue ancient names of which were Veii, Volsinii, Clusium, Perusia, cities of Crotona, Aretium, Falerii, Volaterra, Vetulonii, Russella, Tar-ancient quinii, and Care b. The modern names are Bolsona, Chiusi, Tuscany. Perusia, Cortona, Arezzo, Civita Castellana, Volterra, Cerveteri. The ancient Veii is thought to be the modern Scrofano, lying within twelves miles of Rome. Vetulo lay near Piombino, and the place on which it stood is now called Bagni di Roselle; and the Tarquinii is supposed to be the modern Cornetto; but

SEVERAL of those towns maintained their liberties and independency for a long time after the reign of Charles the Great, and still make a figure in history. The territory of Perugia contains the lake of Thrasymene (now called the lake of Perugia) famous in ancient history for the deseat of the Romans by Hannibal near its borders. Perugia at present contains three churches, which are worth seeing, three colleges, an university sounded almost sive hundred years ago, and two academies for the fine arts. Several people of quality reside in Perugia; and its ancient territory, before it fell under the dominion of the church, was not inconsiderable.

of the three last places no vestiges remain.

corrona, or as some call it Crotona, lies in the terriritory of Florence; and, though formerly of great importance to that people, who deprived it of its independency, though not of all its privileges, is now remarkable for little else than being the seat of a bishop immediately subject to the pope, and for the literary meetings of its inhabitants, which are called nocles Corytanea, or, Cortonean entertainments,

b CLUVER. Introd. ad Geograph. pag. 137.

The History of the Tuscan States.

AREZZO now belongs to Florence, and is frequently mentioned in the following history for the noble struggle its inhabitants made in defence of their liberties, and for their generous attachment to the Florentines, as long as the terms on which they submitted to that state were observed. It is likewise a bishop's see, and is situated on a declivity, surrounded by a lovely sertile valley; but both its churches and houses are now gone to decay, though it still preserves some remains of ancient grandeur.

CIVITA CASTELLANA, the capital of the ancient Falisci, is now a small mean looking town, in St. Peter's patrimony, situated on a high steep rock near the confluence of the rivers Triglia and Tevere. It contains many marks of antiquity. Its bishopric is joined to that of Orta, and a stupendous bridge is built from the city to an oppofite mountain.

VOLTERRA lies in the territory of Pisa, and though flanding on a mountain its air is unwholesome. It is said to contain twenty-five churches, chapels, and oratories, and about twenty convents and religious fraternities, and yet upon the whole it is a poor desert looking place. It is likewise a bishopric, and contains copper mines, which are not worked.

CERVETERI likewise lies in St. Peter's patrimony, and is a place now so inconsiderable, that it is scarcely mentioned in the maps. Some authors are of opinion that Orta was one of the ancient Tuscan cities, and that it ought to stand in the room of Veii.

The HISTORY of FLORENCE.

SECT. II.

Containing the History of Florence at the time of the Decadence of the Roman Empire; the Character of the Florentines, and the other Tuscan States; and the Revolutions of the Florentine Government to the Year 1277.

HE Etrurians, or Tuscans, of whose country Florence Observais now the capital, were the parents of the Roman retion. ligion, learning, and policy; and that city, with its territory, ever fince the revival of literature in Europe, has been so distinguished in arts, in sciences, and at certain periods in arms, that old Rome cannot be said to have owed more to the Etrurians, than modern Europe does to the Florentines.

THE ancient history of Florence is blended with that of Rome, nor know we of any author who has treated of it separately. We shall therefore commence this history from the year 408, when the Fiorentines instituted a festival-day in Festival commemoration of the great overthrow given by Stilicho, the instituted general of the emperor Honorius, to the Goths in the Fesulane at Flomountains near Florence, and which delivered that city from rence. those barbarians. The barbarians, however, again gathering head, about the year 414, Florence and its territory were again depopulated, and for some years after the Florentines bore their share in that general devastation which overspread all Italy; nor is the reader, in such indiscriminate scenes of ruin, to expect any particular history of this country. All we know is, that Alaric, the Gothic king or general, led a fresh First irbody of those barbarians into Italy, and the emperor Hono-ruption of rius gave his consent that they should pass in a friendly man- the Goth ner to the confines of Gaul. The barbarians appear to have into Tu been Christians; for the imperial generals treacherously took cany. advantage of their high veneration for Easter-Sunday to attack them on that day, which the Goths thought ought to be facred from blood, and suffered themselves at first to be cut in pieces. rather than fight. At last, roused by the implety of the Im-perialists, they fell upon them with such sury, that they gained a complete victory; and, instead of continuing their march towards Gaul, they took possession of Tuscany. Stilicho was fent against them; but, having himself an eye to the empire, he protracted the war, without driving the barbarians from their new habitations. That great general being taken off. through the jealousy of Honorius, the Goths spread themselves all over Italy, and plundered Rome itself. Upon the death of Alaric, they chose Athaulphus, his kinsman, for their leader: of the bar and having again plundered Rome, and ravaged Tuscany, they broke into Gaul. Athaulphus then married Placidia, the daughter of the emperor Theodosius, and sister of Arcadius and Honerius, whom the Goths in their first irruption into Rome had led away captive. On the death of Athaulphus, the was married to Constantius, by whom she had Valentinian, who succeeded to the Roman empire after the death of the emperor Honorius.

Succeffica barian kings.

A. D.

447.

feated,

besieges

and de-

Aroys it:

His pro-

Irruption

gress.

ruli.

THE next irruption of the barbarians into Italy was more Irruption of the dreadful than all the preceding ones. They were com-Hunns un-manded by the two brothers Attila and Bleda; but the former der Attila; having flain the latter, he became a great and powerful mo-parch. That species of barbarians he headed were called

Hunns: Their original habitations were near the Palus Mastis; and their devastations were so inhuman and rapid. that Theodoric, king of the Goths in Italy, joined his forces with Ætius, the emperor Valentinian's general. A battle succeeded, in which one hundred and fixty thousand men on both fides are faid to have been killed; amongst whom was Theodoric, whose death so greatly dispirited his subjects, that though Attila loft the victory, he still maintained his footing who, after in Italy. Having recruited his army from Pannonia, he laid being de- fiege to Aquileia, and, after befieging it for three years, he took and levelled it to the ground. He then made himself master of Vicenza, Verena, Milan, and a great number of Aquileia, other cities; but was diverted by Leo, bishop of Rome, from attacking that capital. Upon the death of Attila, the Vandals broke into Italy, and renewed all the ravages of the Goths and the Hunns, under their leader Genseric. Odoacer was the fourth barbarian prince who made himself master of Italy and of the Van- of Rame, and is said to have been king of the Turalingi and dals, and the Heruli. The feat of the Roman empire was now at Conof the He-stantinople; and the emperor Zeno engaged Theodoric, king of the Goths in Italy, to march against Odoacer, whom he defeated and killed at Ravenna, and thereby Theodoric became king of Italy, which now suffered more than ever by the sury of the barbarians2. The chief scenes of their ravages being * LEONARDI ARETIKI Hist. Flor. p. 15.

about

about Florence and in Tuscany, whose particular history is swallowed up in that of their barbarism; so that we know little of it till the time of the Longobards under their king Alboine. This prince made himself master of Tuscany, and almost all Italy. Having killed Cunimund, king of the Gepidæ, another of those barbarous nations that then ravaged all the continent of Europe, in fingle combat, he married Rosemund, Cunimund's beautiful daughter, and made a drinking cup of her father's scull, out of which he forced his queen to drink. The queen diffembled her indignation; but applied for revenge to two officers. One of them had been affronted by the king, and she knew the other to be deeply in love with herself; and admitting them into the royal bed-chamber, they Death of murdered Alboine, and she made her escape to Ravenna.

A KIND of an anarchy succeeded amongst the barbarians in Italy for about ten years. Each head of a clan, or family, feized the city or principality that was most convenient for him; nor does it appear, in history, to what particular barbarian the government of Tulcany fell during that time. It is however certain, that the Longobards, or Lombards, were masters of Italy, Rome and its territory excepted, for two hundred and four years, till they were displaced by Charles the The bar-Great, who is faid to have restored Florence, and Tuscany in barians general, to a respectable condition, after they had suffered conquered more than any country in Italy from the fury of the bar-by Charles Some writers have been of opinion, that, during the the Great. reign of barbarism in Italy, Florence was intirely levelled to the ground, and deferted by its inhabitants.

WE are not, however, to take for granted all the invectives General published against those northern masters of Italy, who perhaps, remark. in fact, were less barbarous than the Italians themselves; at least, they were much less so than Charles the Great, who conquered them. The remains of antiquity, still extant at Florence, prove that it never was utterly demolished; nor is there any likelihood of its being new-peopled. The legislation of the barbarians, as they are called, (the Longobards in particular) was the wifest and the most civilized of any other people, and tended rather to population than devastation. The ravages they were obliged to commit, proceeded not fo much from their own dispositions as from the treachery, the folly, and ingratitude of the imperial court and officers. brave and warlike in the field, they knew little of the art of befieging; and the nobility and chief land-holders of Tuscany foon learned to immure themselves, their families, and attendants in castles and fortifications, by which they were commonly fafe during the ravages of war. The natural fertility tility of the country sufficed for their sublishence, while the barbarians were generally at war amongst themselves. No sooner, however, did those ravages cease than the antient inhabitants refumed their former habitations; and it is more than probable, that all that Charles did for Florence and Tuscany, was his giving their former inhabitants a farther fecurity, by repairing the fortifications of their cities.

ABOUT the year 773, Charles, or, as he is called, Charle-

Institutions of Charles magne, having been crowned and confirmed king of Italy by in Italy.

the pope, the governments of the several states there began to recover some degree of consistency. The original families of Italy, and the descendants of the various class of barbarians who had inhabited it, were now blended into one common mass; and the foedal laws, which were of Gothic original, and then prevailed all over Italy, gave the leading men or magistrates of each state a degree of authority very little subordinate to that of supreme. All that Charles required were certain tributes, or what we call reddendos, as marks of his fovereignty; and he left them, in other respects, to make the best of their situation and natural powers. Of those states, the most eminent were Pisa, Florence, Perugia, and Sienna, and each had a separate manner of cultivating its interest. Character The Pisans applied themselves to maritime affairs, being the of the Plo- only maritime city in Tuscany that was lest standing.

and the

rentines, Perugians turned themselves to agriculture, to which they were encouraged by the fertility of their soil. The Siennese other Tuf- had a rich nobility, which maintained them in affluence: but can flates. the Florentines were distinguished over all the other inhabitants of Tuscary by industry, their knowledge of the civil arts, and their uncommon strength of genius. For some time those states lived in great harmony with each other; but that was foon interrupted by the disputes between the popes of Rome and the emperors of Germany. The empire, which was originally founded in Germany by Charles the Great, for the protection of the Roman pontificate, had almost proved its ruin; and ignorance and superstition, which daily gained ground after the establishment of that empire, both in Italy and elsewhere, did not leave an option for any flate to be neutral, farther than as its intestine divisions prevented its being of much fervice to either party. Such was the condition of Tuscany, which, in this quarrel, suffered perhaps more than she had done from the barbarians. The emperor, Fre-

Tyranny of deric II. of Germany, put to death, by various tortures, many the empe- of the Tuscan nobility, who had taken part with the see of ror Frede- Rome; and they, in return, had their revenge upon his party. ric II,

FREDERIC however prevailed, and at last brought the who fab-Flarentines into a state of subjection, by banishing that part jects the of the nobility which opposed him. It is from his death that, Florenproperly speaking, the history of Florence ought to commence. tines. The remembrance of his tyranny inspired the Florentines with fuch an aversion to monarchical government, that from thenceforth Florence became a republic. The people took They erest the direction of affairs upon themselves; and the wisdom, themselves spirit, and steadiness with which they proceeded upon their into an innew model are almost incredible. They first recalled, and dependent reinstated in their former conditions, the nobility that Frede-flate. ric had banished, and thereby more than balanced the interest of their antagonists. They next made choice of twelve magistrates, who, on account of their pre-eminence, were called Antiani. They divided their city into fix wards, from which were to be elected their magistrates, and all their public officers. They instituted a militia out of those wards, properly regimented, which militia was to oppose any factious attempts of their nobles at home, and to repel all attacks from abroad. Florence now rose to be an independent government, and every one of its magistrates was a patriot. Their first war was with the Pistoians; who though they had been reduced, like the Florentines, to a state of slavery by Frederic II. yet still continued their attachment to the German emperors. This raised the jealousy of the Florentines, who looked upon the Pistoians as the enemies of their liberty, so high, that, not- Their sour withstanding all the opposition the imperial faction made, with the they invaded the territory of the Pistoians, and defeating their Pistoians, army, drove it within the walls of their city. The Florentines, whom the returning victorious to their capital, chased from thence all the Subdueremains of the imperial faction who had refused to serve in the Pistoian war. Those exiles fled to Sienna and Pisa, and excited the magistrates of those cities to a war with the Florentines, who foon after restored the party who had been exiled from Arezzo, another city of Tuscany, for their opposition to Frederic. After this they entered into an alliance with four other states, some of whose names are little known at this time, Lucca, Miatenentia, Urbino, and Alsium, now The consequences of this consederacy were, that the Florentines, in the same year, brought two armies into the field; the first against the Mugelli, whom they defeated; and the other against Mantaria, which last city they took in a winter campaign, and levelled to the ground. That same year they entered into an alliance with the Genoese against the Pisans.

b LEONARDI ARETINI, Hist. Flor. p. 19.

Their farther successes:

NEXT year they wasted the lands of their enemies about Pavia, and took the place by the help of warlike engines. While the Florentines were befieging Pavia, their allies of Lucca were defeated by the Pifans, who were returning home with a vast number of captives. When the Florentines heard of the defeat of the Lucquese, they instantly resolved to rescue their confederates; and a strong detachment from their army was fent for that purpose, which overtook the Pisans near the river Hera. A bloody battle enfued, in which the Florentines were victorious, and filled with Pisans the fetters in which the Lucquese had been dragged before. After this, the Florentine noblemen, who had been exiled, chose Guido Novello for their head, and marched against Florence as far as Fighini. Being opposed by the Florentines, the nobles made themselves masters of Fighini, which the Florentines besieged. A treaty was then proposed and concluded, by which the nobles were re-admitted to the city; but Fighini was demolished, and its inhabitants were incorporated with the citizens of Florence.

They defeat the Siennese,

This expedition being thus gloriously finished by the Florentines, before they returned home they marched to the deliverance of their confederates the Palonese, who were then reduced to great distress by the Siennese, who were deseated in a bloody battle by the Florentines. So many great fuccesses in one campaign, gave vast spirit to the citizens of Florence; and next year they obliged the Pistoians to sue for peace, and to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance against all the enemies of Florence, and likewise to recal to their city all who had been exiled from it on account of their aversion to the German emperor. Next year the Florentines undertook an important expedition against the Siennese, who were obliged to fue for peace, which was granted them on condition of their never again entering into war with Alfium, and of their never fheltering or favouring the enemies of Florence. The Florentines, after that, marched against Bonetium, which they instantly reduced. They then marched against Volterra. Their quarrel with the Volterrans was on account of their taking part with the Pisans, and the other enemies of Florence. art of war was then very imperfect in Italy; and the Florentines, in a kind of bravado, advanced their standards to the foot of the lofty eminence on which Volterra is fituated; upon which the Volterrans made a tumultuous fally, without any At first they were victorious; but head to conduct them: the Florentines recovering from their consternation, drove their Volterral enemies back into their city, which they entered along with the fugitives. All fighting was then at an end: the women and clergy threw themselves at the feet of the conquerors, who generously stopt all hostilities, and contented themselves with obliging some of the factious noblemen to leave the city, whose government from thence became republican. expedition was begun and finished in a few days. The Floring rentine army then marched against the Pifans, who were so terrified by its successes, that they shut themselves up in their capital, and fent ambaffadors to negotiate a peace, which they obtained, but upon hard terms, and they were obliged to give hostages for the performance. The Florentines then returned triumphantly home; and the same year, which they called the year of victories, they erected in their city a magnificent town-house, and other noble edifices, for the administration of public justice, which till then had been confined to the houses of their several magistrates.

LEONARDI ARETINI, Hist. Flor. p. 20.

NEXT year, at the request of the people of Urbing, the Good faith Florentines sent a body of five hundred horse to their affishance. of the Flo-These, in their march, halted at Arezzo, where the Gibelius, rentines in or imperial faction, possessed the government; but no sooner their wars. did the Florentine horse arrive there than the Guelphs, or the papal faction, which the Florentines favoured, ran to arms, and drove the Gibelins out of the city. The news of this coming to Florence, the government there thought that their general Guido, surnamed Guerra, or the Warlike, had exceeded his commission, by committing hostilities in a city with which they were at peace; and they immediately fent an army, which obliged the Guelph faction at Arezzo to re-admit the expelled Gibelins. This delicacy of the Florentines in obferving good faith, effected a reconciliation between them and Truce with, the Arezzians, who put themselves under the protection of Arezzo. Florence; and a truce was concluded between the two people for five years, during three of which the Arezzians obliged themselves to chuse a Florentine for their chief magistrate, who always was a foreigner. The same year the Florentines League made a league with the Siennese, by which it was agreed, that with Sienneither people should harbour the rebels of the other; but be na. obliged to expel them, upon requisition: and thus the affairs of the Florentines seemed to be in a tranquil situation d.

They did not, however, long continue fo. The em-History of peror Frederic left two fons, Conrade and Manfred; the first Conrade legitimate, the latter illegitimate. But Manfred, notwith and Manfred the difadvantage of his birth, possessed for many nafred twial endowments, that his father at his death left him the

LEONARDI ARETINI Hift. Flor. p 23.

timate brother Conrade, having been crowned king of the Romans, assumed the imperial dignity, and marched from Germany to take possession of his Italian dominions. By the papal intrigues and power, Innocent IV. then being pope, he was kept out of the possession of Naples and Capua; and while he Death of was endeavouring to reduce them to his obedience he died, Conrade. as is faid, by poison administered to him by Manfred, on the twenty-second of May, 1254, leaving only one son, called Conradin, who was then in Germany, under the tuition of his mother Elizabeth of Bavaria. While Conrade was on his death-bed, he had committed the care of his fon and his concerns into the hands of his wife and her relations. Manfred. who was a very ambitious prince, refenting this, struck in with the Holy See; and, stripping young Conradin's guardians of all their authority in Italy, he usurped the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily; but pretended he held them only till young Conradin should be of age. Soon after this, Manfred, > having gained his ends, broke with pope Innocent, who died not long after, and was succeeded by Alexander IV. in the year Both parties prepared for war, and both were powerfully supported; but cardinal Octavian, the papal general, being of the house of Ubaldi, was thought to have favoured Manfred to much, that the pope intirely loft the kingdom of league with the Florentines.

Manfred gains ground.

Naples. THIS success of the Gibelins so greatly elevated the Pisans. break their that they broke their lately contracted league with the Florentines, and, invading their territories, they committed vast Upon this the Florentines and the Lucquese devastations. joined their forces, and gave the Pisans a total defeat upon the banks of the Arno; no fewer than three thousand Pisans being made prisoners. The consequence of the victory was, that the victors marched to the very gates of Pifa, and forcing the Pilans into a shameful peace, obliged them to deliver up the town of Matrona, with a large compass of the fea-coast; to give the Florentines the freedom of their city; and to make use of Florentine weights and measures. Notwithstanding those successes, Manfred daily gained such ground, that the Florentines thought proper, all of a sudden, to make themselves masters of Boneti, and partly to dismantle it; while the people of Arezzo did the same by Cortona.

In the mean while, the nobility of the Gibelin faction, within Florence, took advantage of the absence of their army, and began to enter into cabals for restoring themselves to all their former power. The Florentine magistrates in vain admonished them both of their duty and their danger; for the malcontents disclaimed their authority, and kept themselves thut up in their houses. The family of the Uberti were, at Fallions this time, at the head of the Florentine Gibelins; and the of the people, or rather the republican party, refented their contu- Guelphs macy so much, that they ran to arms, broke into the palace and Gibeof the Uberti, and, after killing some, forced all the Gibelins line in to take refuge in Sienna, where they found shelter. This was Italy. a direct violation of the league between the Florentines and the Siennese, which had been concluded three years before: and the Florentines fent two eminent lawyers, Albicio Trincivelle and Giacomo Gerardi, to complain of their breach of The Florentine Gibelins, however, had made so strong a party in Sienna, and the dread of Manfred's power was there so great, that the ambassadors could obtain no satisfac-Upon which the Florentines declared war against tion. them.

mal-

THE Florentine exiles, dreading the consequence of this The Florentine declaration, fent a nobleman of the Uberti family, one Fari-rentines nata, and several other persons of consideration, to implore implore Manfred's protection and affiltance. Those ambassadors, Manfred's being admitted into that prince's presence, made him a most protection. pathetic speech, which Manfred seemed to attend to; but all they could obtain was a fingle squadron of German horse, whom they were to carry with them to Sienna. His coldness, at a juncture so promising to his interest, is imputed to his apprehension that the Siennese and the Florentine exiles were less in his interest than in that of his nephew Conradin. The affistance he proposed was so little proportioned to the exigency, that the deputies at first were for declining it; but Farinata was of a contrary opinion: " Let Manfred, said he, Magnania give us the squadron, and we shall soon manage matters so, mity of that, if he has within him one spark of royalty, he will send their gegreater reinforcements." This magnanimity brought the neral. deputies over to Farinata's sentiments. They waited upon Manfred, and, with great expressions of joy in their countenances, they gave him thanks, and accepted of the proffered

While this deputation was in dependence, the Florentines Their was had actually entered the territories of Sienna, and over-ran with the whole country to the very gates of that capital, which Sienna, they blocked up. The deputies, returning with their German squadron, resolved at once to attack the Florentine army; but the attempt carried with it so desperate an appearance, that they thought proper to prepare the Germans by plying them with liquor for the whole night before the intended attack, which was made with so much surv next morning, that Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

the Florentines were thrown into disorder; and a total rout must have ensued, had not their commanders rallied them, and shewn them, that the small handful of Germans were unsupported by other troops. Upon this the Florentines took courage, drove the Siennese, who had made a fally, back to their city, and, cutting in pieces every one of the Germans, they treated Manfred's standard, which they took, with particular ignominy. It appears, however, that they made no farther attempt upon Sienna; but returned home in a few days, though the fummer was but half gone.

As Farinata had foreseen, the above d loss and disgrace en-Manfred's raged Manfred so much, that, upon a fresh application made resentment. to him by the Florentine exiles, he ordered one of his generals, Fordano, to put himself at the head of fifteen hundred of his best cavalry, to march to the affistance of the Siennese and the Gibelins of Florence. This seasonable reinforcement gave sresh foirit to that cause, and a kind of an universal league was formed to support it. For no sooner did the German auxiliaries arrive upon the Siennese territories, their time of absence being limited only to three months, than the people of Pifa, and of feveral neighbouring cities, declared for the Gibelin party, and a general rendezvous of the confederate troops was held at Sienna; from whence they prepared to proceed to besiege Alcino, a town allied with Florence, but with all the Siennels territories intervening. This resolution being published, put the Florentines under great difficulties, not daring to carry their troops to such a distance from their city against so powerful a confederacy. Treachery is faid to have mingled in their deliberations. The gravest and most experienced of their nobility and military officers were against marching their army; but their magistrates and common people being of another opinion, the nobility refolved to go in a body to lay their sense of the situation of the public before their magistrates, and they chose Teglari Adomar for their spokesman. Aretino, the Florentine historian, has recorded an excellent speech which Teglari made on this occasion against their marching, founded upon the short time the German auxiliaries were to be in the field, and upon the expediency of guarding their own city, and at the fame time harrassing the territories of Sienna by incursions and inroads, which would oblige them Impetuofity to remain at home. All the answer he received was, that, if of the Flo- he was afraid to march, he might have his dismission: and, to put an end to all farther debate, the magistrates, with the approbation of the people, imposed a fine upon all who should dare to oppose the march of their troops. The only difficulty now remaining was how to guard against the faction of the Gibelin party in the city, during the absence of the army a but at last it was resolved to sorce them to serve in the army. After this, the Florentine magistracy gave notice to their allies of Lucca and Areazo to be in readiness to join them about four miles from the city of Sienna, which the Florentines flattered themselves would fall into their hands by an insurrection of the Guelph inhabitants, who disapproved of the fordano and the German auxiliaries had not yet left Siema; and ordering the gates to be shut, he remained for some time within the city, which confirmed the Florentines in their opinion that an infurrection would happen. But Fordono having disposed every thing for a furious attack, and ordering the gates to be thrown open, he advanced against the Florentines at the head of his German cavalry, and was followed by the Siennese and all the Florentine exiles. The Florentines, not expecting such an onset, were put into confusion; but their horse behaved so bravely, that the success of the battle was for some time doubtful, till the Gibelin Florentines, whom they forced along with them, declared for the enemy; and the Florentine cavalry, not even knowing how to trust one another, abandoned the foot. It was the custom in those days for European armies (the same prevailed in England) to carry along with them a chariot, or rather a stage, most magnificently decorated, and in the middle was fixed their chief flandard, which they considered as the palladium of their The Florentine foot, finding themselves abandoned by who are their cavalry, flocked round their standard, embraced it with totally detears of affection, and performed miracles in its defence; but feated by all was to no effect. The disciplined Germans cut every man the Sienof them to pieces, to the number of three thousand, who nele. fought round their standard, and made four thousand prisoners in other parts of the field, besides taking the camp, baggage, and equipages of the Florentines.

rentines,

LEONARDI ARETINI Hist. Flor. p. 26.

It is incredible what horror, grief, despair, and distraction, Divisions overspread Florence upon this news. It was then that the of their effect of popular rashness, inspired by success, eminently ap-magis-peared. The great things the Florentines had done, were by trates, the common people and their magistrates, who were chosen out of the common people, ascribed to their valour alone; and they looked upon the nobility, who were, in general, men of a liberal education, and of sentiments far above what were common in that age, as so many dead weights upon their state, and obstacles to their courage. They treated their gave remonstrances as so many pleadings for cowardice, and their lessons upon civil and military conduct as attainable by the meanest capacity. In proportion as their presumption had been great in prosperity, their despondency was despicable under adversity; and, without consulting aught but their own fears, they abandoned the city: some of them removing to Lucca, and others to Bologna, at both which places they were most hospitably received and entertained; and about the middle of October, 1260, the Florentine exiled nobility reentered Florence without the least opposition. Their return put an end to the popular government of Florence, which had lasted for about ten years.

2 their

The Gibelins get possession of Florence,

FROM that time the Florentines changed their masters 5. Guido Novello, a Gibelin nobleman, was put at the head of their civil, and Fordano of their military affairs. Public justice was administered in Manfred's name. The inhabitants were obliged to swear allegiance to him, and the German soldiers were paid out of the Flerentine treasury; while the houses, estates, and goods of all who had left the city, were conficated or demolished. This revolution, however, was far from removing the apprehensions of the Gibelin party. who fent a fresh deputation to Manfred, intrcating him to prolong the continuance of Fordano and his troops at Florence; but all they could obtain was a few months. this passed, the city of Arezzo was miserably divided between the Guelph and the Gibelin factions; and, by Manfred's orders, a general congress of the heads of his party was convocated at Empoli. The subject of their deliberations was, in what manner Manfred's interest could be best strengthened in Tuscany; and the general opinion was, that Florence ought to be demolished to the ground. Farinata, whom we have mentioned above, was the only member who had the courage to oppose this barbarous resolution. The speech he made on this weighty occasion was full of dignity and resolution, and coming from a person of his exalted character and known courage, startled the affembly so much, that Florence was preserved; and Fordano being recalled, the whole power of the state, civil and military, was committed to Novello, who, besides the ordinary troops kept up by the Florentines, had under his command a thousand mercenary horsemen. The first use Novello made of his power was to attack the territories of the Lucquese, for having received the Florentine fugitives. Having destroyed the plain country, and taken some castles, he laid siege to Lucca; but that city was well provided for a defence, and the Florentine fugitives within it behaved with so great valour, that, the rainy weather coming on, he was obliged to raise the siege, and return to Florence.

E LEONARDI ARETINI Hist. Flor. p. 33.

His retreat gave the Lucquese and the Florentine fugitives who apple time to deliberate; and they resolved to implore the protec- to Conration of young Conradin, who remained still in Germany, un-din, grandder his mother's protection. Two Florentine knights, Simon fon to Fre-Donati and Bonacursto Adimar, were intrusted with this em-deric II. bassy; and when they arrived at Conradin's court, which was Germany; extremely sensible of Manfred's persistions proceedings, they found it disposed as they could have wished for: but the prince's tender age proved an infurmountable obstacle to their success, and they were obliged to return to Lucca. Next year, viz. 1262, the Florentines there found means to furprife Segni; upon which Novel's once more invaded the territories of the Lucquese, and, being joined by the Pisans, he defeated the Lucquese and the Fierentine fugitives, who were far inferior to him, in a pitched battle, which put into the hands of Novello the greatest part of the territory of Lucca without the walls of that capital. Those missortunes obliged The Lucthe Lucquese, many of whom were of the Gibelin party, to quese exenter into a fecret treaty with Novello; one article of which pel the Flowas, that the Florentine sugitives should be expelled from the rentine territories of Lucca, and that there should be a firm union Gibeling. between the Lucquese and the Florentines, with a general release of prisoners on both sides. The sugitives had suspected nothing of this treaty, when, all of a sudden, they had orders to evacuate the Lucquese territories, which they were obliged instantly to do, with their wives and children, and to retire to Bologna. They were followed by great numbers of the Arezzians, who could no longer resist the arms of Nevelle. It is amazing that this sudden reverse of fortune, by which a people, who, but a few days before, were little less than sovereigns, was reduced to a state of exile and beggary, did not damp them, or at least prevail upon them to apply for some mitigation from their countrymen. But the enthusiasm Effects of of party had touched their brains, and indeed those of all the enthusiajm. Italians in general; and it is hard, at this time, to decide upon the merits of the two parties that then divided Italy, and the greatest part of Europe. The Gibelins could not bear with the upstart insolence of the bishops of Rome. The Guelphs could not endure the tyranny of the emperors and of Manfred, and perhaps they considered the pope as a power far less formidable than either of them. Such seems to have been the fentiments of the exiled Florentines of the Guelph faction, who confidered their country as being subdued by Manfred, and they disdained to live as slaves in states where they had reigned as masters; but their fortune was on the eve of a new revolution. MODENA, like the other parts of Italy, was torn between the two factions of Guelphs and Gibelins. The exiled Florexiles of fift rentines were now confidered as foldiers of fortune, and the Guelph faction in that city invited them to their affistance. The exiles chearfully obeyed the call, and drove the Gibelins. out of Modena. They were rewarded by having the money and effects of the expelled party divided amongst them, which, being very confiderable, enabled them to make a very handfome appearance. The fame of their good fortune foon reached Tuscany, and others of their party joined them: Reggio, which lies in the neighbourhood of Modena, was pretty much in the same situation; and the Guelphs there had likewise taken arms against the Gibelins, who were headed by one Cosca, a man of gigantic stature, and of such amazing strength and activity, that he carried an army in his own per-It was owing to him that the Gibelins, on all occasions, worsted the Guelphs in Reggio; and the latter, in imitation of those of Modena, called in the adventurers, who slew to their deliverance. Being admitted into the town, a dreadful conflict enfued in the market-place, where Casca, as usual, bore down all before him, till he was attacked and killed by a chosen band of Florentines, with the young Foresius Adimar, who was general of the expedition, at their head; and who is faid, by some writers, to have killed Casca with his own hand in fingle combat, after a desperate engagement. conquerors received the like rewards here, but in greater abundance, as at Modena; and now the exiles began to be of great consequence in Italy, where affairs took an unexpected turn.

The Florentine the Modenese ' Guelphs.

Buecesson of the popes.

POPE Alexander IV. was obliged all this time to keep himfelf shut up in Viterbo, not daring to trust himself amongst the Romans. Upon his death, he was succeeded by Urban IV. a Frenchman, who had been a shoe-maker at Troye in Champagne. Seeing that the power of Manfred and the Germans threatened the extinction of the papal power in Italy, and perceiving that the young Conradin, who had then only the title of duke of Austria, was too weak to reduce Manfred, or to recover the kingdoms he had usurped, he bestowed, as far as he could bestow, the kingdom of Naples upon Charles of Anjou, brother to Lewis the Saint, and king of France. Charles accepted of the compliment, and made preparations to take possession of his kingdom. In the mean while pope Urban died, and was succeeded by Clement IV. who, like his predecessor, was intirely in the French interest, and confirmed the grant his predecessor had made to Charles of Anjou, though in evident prejudice to the rights of young Conradin. Saint Lewis, it is true, seemed to make some difficulty in agreeing Charles of to strip an unoffending minor of his property; but the pope Anjou got the better of all his scruples, and Charles embarked at crowned Marseilles with thirty gallies, and arrived at Rome in the year king of 1265, where he was solemnly crowned king of Naples and Naples. Sicily, but upon very advantageous terms to the Holy See, and received the important dignity of a Roman senator.

WHEN we write the history of Florence at this period, we Brave exwite that of the brave Florentine exiles, who refused to sub-ploits of mit to Manfred's usurpations, and who had offered their ser-the Florenvices to pope Clement, in support of his new system of power tines un-They were now very numerous, well equipped with der bim. arms, and experienced in war. The pope with great joy took them into his service, and told them he would depend in agreat meafure upon them for fuccess. At the same time he made them a present of a new armorial bearing for their standard, which was a red eagle squeezing between his talons a blue dragon. After this, at the recommendation of the pope. they made Guido Guerra their general, and they marched in a body to join Charles of Anjou's army in the plains of Mantua, where they excelled all the other troops in the beauty of their appearance and the richness of their armour. They were received with peculiar honours by Charles and his generals. they being the first Italians who joined him; and their historians have given us a detail of the complimental speeches that passed between Charles and Guido upon this occasion. It is certain, that our adventurers did him vast services, as his troops were intirely strangers in the country. He immediately directed his march towards Monte Casino, where he entered his new kingdom, and where our adventurers gave the first specimens of their courage in his service, by making themselves masters of one of Manfred's forts, which our historians distinguish by no other name than that of the German town. After this a great number of other places furrendered to Charles, whose progress was so rapid, that Manfred resolved to put the whole to a short issue, that of the sword. Charles being equally forward, both armies drew up in order of battle in the plains of Benevento, the country of the ancient Samnites. Before the battle joined, Manfred observed a body of troops, superior in appearance to all the rest of Charles's army, of different armour, and under a separate command. Observing at the same time the new device of their standard, he asked, with assonishment, who they were. Being told that they were the exiled Florentines of the Guelph party, " Then, said he, where are the Florentines of my party, on whom I have : heaped to many favours?" He was answered, that none of them were in the field. This answer drew from him several violent expressions against their ingratitude and cowardice, and pointing to the exiles, " That body of men, faid he, this day must be conquerors; for, if I am victorious, I am determined, at any rate, to make them my friends." Manfred then ordered the fignal for battle. Guido was at the head of the Florentines, and their standard-bearer was Corrad Magnimontano, a Pistoian knight. Their courage in the battle was answerable to their warlike appearance. Manfred's army was defeated, and he himsfelf was killed; and amongst the prisoners made by the Florentines were several of their capital and killed, enemies, particularly fordano, who, four years before, had given them the fatal defeat near Sienna, and who finished his life in prison. By this victory Charles came into possession of all the kingdom of Naples.

· Manfred defeated

THE Gibelin faction in Florence were terribly disconcerted Popular government by this success of Charles; and the friends and relations of the restored in exiles began now holdly to avow their principles. Novella, Florence. the governor of Florence (who till then had acted very oppressively in his office) and his creatures saw it was in vain for them to refift; and confented that a council of thirty-fix, half Gibelins, half Guelphs, should be instituted, to take care of the affairs of the public. The head of the Gibelins was Cathalani, as Lodoringo was of the Guelphs. Thus popular government was, in some measure, restored in Florence. The heads of the two parties agreed so well together, that many excellent civil institutions at this time took place there. The different artists and tradesmen were divided into companies. Each had its separate distinctions and armorial bearings; and it was agreed, that all should assemble, in cases of danger to the state. The nobility did not relish their loss of power, and began to cabal together, when the people refused to pay the mercenaries that had been hired by Novello, who, calling his friends and troops together, expelled the thirty-fix from their posts in the government; and from that time a civil war The Lamberti, a noble family in Florence, commenced. joined with Novello; who marching to reduce the populace, at the head of his Germans and the nobility, was received with fuch a shower of stones, discharged from the windows and roofs of the houses, that he was obliged to retreat to the old temple of Mars, which was the place of rendezvous for his party. He then repaired to the house where Cathalani and Lodoringo were, where he demanded the keys of the citygates, which, after some difficulty, were sent to him; and then

then he, with all the nobility of his party, and his German mercenaries, marched out of the city and took post at Prate. This measure had been dictated by jealousy and fear, though the two magistrates of the people had promised to quiet the tumult if he would remain in the city. Upon recollection, he found he had mistaken his measures, and marched back with his troops and followers to Florence, where he found Novello the gates shut. Both intreaties and force were ineffectual expelled for his re-admittance; and after spending some hours in vain, from Flohe was obliged again to make his retreat to Prate.

THE people thus regaining the government of their city, The conflithought of reverting to the principles of their first popular tution re-

constitution, and of restoring the magistracy of the Antiani, Sored, under which they had done so great things, and which accordingly taking place, the authority of the two late presidents, instituted by Novello, was thereby abolished. It is wonderful with what moderation this restored model of the Florentine government was established. The people by their late sufferings became sensible of their former errors; and though the illustrious exiles were restored to their estates and dignities, yet a law passed that made no difference between them and the nobility of Novello's faction, if the latter should think proper to return to the city. The Guelph exiles re-together turned covered with laurels, and were received with prodi- with the gious acclamations of the people, who, intent upon banish-Guelph ing civil animolities, obliged Novello to give his daughter in exiles. marriage to Forefius Adimar. The contending families of the Uberti and Lamberti were united in the same manner, and their examples produced the like alliances amongst the other nobility of opposite factions. It is remarked in history, that those intermarriages arose from the people reslecting upon the dreadful consequences that had happened to their state in former times on account of disagreeable marriages.

This nuptial expedient however was far from having the defired effect. The people pushed their power too far in becoming the match-makers, and in forcing the parties to intermarry. The heart-burnings between the two factions began again to gather strength, and the exiles, who were not returned to their country, treating the opposite party as vanquished, severely resented their having deserted them at the battle near Sienna, which the Florentine historians call the battle of Arbe, because it was fought on the banks of that river. While those discontents continued, Convadin, the Factions lawful heir to the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, which had again now twice been wickedly torn from him, though no more break out, than sixteen years of age, was making preparations to recover his paternal inheritance. The injustice done him in prepares to his infancy, as well as his right of blood, had raifed him recover his many friends; but it was necessary for him to depend for support upon the Gibelin faction. Charles of Anjou, now king of Naples and Sicily, forefaw the storm approaching, and his first care was to secure Tuscany in his interest. With this view he sent, by the advice as is said of the Florentines, Malatesta, an illustrious Italian nobleman, and one of his officers, with a body of horse, to overawe the Pisans and the Sennese, and in fact all Tuscany. But as king of Naples and Sicily he could have no pretention upon Tuscany; and the holy see, by a most unheard of strain of injustice, was obliged to give him a title. The pope pretended that during the vacancy of the Roman empire the temporary government of Tuscany devolved upon him, and under this arbitrary claim Charles of he constituted Charles of Anjou the imperial vicar or lieutenant over the whole province. The exiles had been returned only made vicar four months when Malatesta fignified his intention to take possession of Florence, as well as the other places in Tuscany.

right.

and the governing party gave him affurances of welcome.

Upon this the Gibelins of the city left it, and for some weeks all the neighbouring country became a scene of robbery and

The Gibelins were now what their adversaries had been before, the opposers of a foreign power, in whose name justice was administered in Florence. But the papal authority covered all defects of title, and the Florentine Guelphs thought they could not exceed in their gratitude to a prince, who, The Gibe- like Charles, had restored them to their country. The selfexiled Gibelins however were very powerful; but at last the places they had made themselves masters of in the Florentine territory were taken by their adversaries, and great numbers of them put to the sword. The Gibelin faction being lin exiles put to the Sword.

Anjou of Tufcany.

another.

papal and the royal decision, which was in favour of the Arbian exiles. This iniquitous sentence was occasioned by the dread of young Conradin, who was now ready to enter Italy, and the defire that both Charles and the pope had to keep the prevailing party in Florence in their interest, having already so fully experienced their fidelity and attachment to the fee of Rome. Thus the very men who had so bravely refifted flavery from one quarter, voluntarily embraced it from thus totally suppressed, the Florentines, who remained in that city, were foon divided into factions, on account of the estates that had been conficated, but were now claimed by those who had been exiled after the battle of Arbe. A vast altercation followed upon this, and the matter was at last referred to the The pope however did not think it sufficient to have only A new cola momentary ascendency over his new subjects; and he maline creded naged so that a political college, for we can call it by no in Floother name, was added to the other colleges of Florence. Are-rence. tin is of opinion that this college subsisted before is but be that as it will, it certainly was renewed and completed at this time. The duty of the members, who had a president, (who sometimes was a foreigner, provided he was a Guelph) assigned to them, was to examine into the principles, qualifications, and conduct of the citizens; and whoever underwent their censure became thereby incapable of all trust in the government.

GUELPHISM being thus firmly established in Florence, War bethe heads of the party declared war against the Siennese, in squeen the revenge of their defeat at Arbe, and laid that territory waste Florento the very gates of Sienna; but they could not bring their tines and enemies to a battle. While the Florentines were upon this Siennese. expedition, the Gibelin exiles rendezvoused at Boniti; upon which the Florentine army marched thither with Malatefla at their head, and laid fiege to the place. The belieged were encouraged to a vigorous defence, by assurances sent them both from Sienna and Pisa, of a powerful diversion in their favour. The defence made by the belieged was so brave. that Charles of Anjou came in person into Tuscany to head the Florentine army. He was received with vast honours at Florence, from whence he set out for the siege. The place being naturally strong, the besieged made a vigorous desence for four months; but the numbers of the beliegers daily encreafing, the garrison at last made an honourable capitulation. and Boniti surrendered to Charles. Though winter at the time of the furrender was far advanced, yet Charles before he went into quarters, took some places from the Pisans, which he gave to his friends the Lucquese, and then put an end to the campaign.

WHILE Charles remained in Tuscany, he reduced the whole Political of that province to his obedience, excepting Sienna and Pisa: state of but he now, viz. in the year 1267, received the important Italy. news that young Conradin, as the representative of the emperor Frederick II. and head of the house of Suabia, had passed the Alps with an army, to make good his family claims in Italy. The popes of this age, had all of them, the same turn of genius, which was for an universal authority in temporals as well as spirituals. Though their power was then but low, for it did not extend even over the city of Rome.

yet their influence was incredible, through the practices of the ecclefiaftics upon the minds of the common people, many of whom, the Florentines especially, were implicitly devoted to the holy see. Those vulgar prepossessions gathered strength. through the ambitious views of contending princes, who in their turns found it their interest to have the Roman pontiff on their side. This was the case first with Manfred, and then with Charles of Anjou, as well as many petty lords and princes in Italy, who, by the favour of the holy fee, had erected themselves into independent governments, only paying a small consideration to the pope. But neither Manfred nor Charles were princes disposed to bear subjection to the holy fee longer than they found it necessary to their ambition; and the pope at this time, who was Clement IV. perceiving Charles, now that he was mafter of Tuscany, to grow too powerful and independent, would probably have broken with him, had he not dreaded the house of Suabia more than he did that of Anjou.

HENRY, brother to the king of Castile, having long led

History of Don Hen- a kind of a knight-errant's life in Africa, where he had acry of Caf-quired a great deal of money in the service of the king of tile, Tunis, about this time came to Italy, and by the mediation > of money was treating with Charles and the pope, who was still at Viterbo, about purchasing the kingdom of Sardinia.

wbo becomes master of Rome.

While this treaty was on foot an infurrection happened at Rome, and Don Henry was employed by the pope to quell it, which he did, and became so popular there, that the pope could not prevent his taking upon him the title and power of governor of Rome. The Castilian by this time began more than to suspect that the pope and Charles, to whom he had lent a great fum of money, intended to deceive and difappoint him. He demanded the repayment of his money from Charles; but receiving no fatisfaction, he renounced their party, and embraced that of Conradin, who thereby obtained a valuable acquisition. Don Henry was not only absolute master of Rome, but had in his interest all the Moslems or Saracens, who remained in the city of Naples, and who were very numerous there, and the king of Tunis, who was then a formidable power to Italy. He had likewise a fine fleet under his command; and his brother Frederick, who was still in the service of the king of Tunis, had secured the greatest part of Sicily to his interest.

Conradin invades Italy.

So many threatening events obliged Charles of Anjou to lay aside the design he had formed of reducing Sienna and Pisa, and to leave the Florentine territories. The Pisans, by Don Henry's affistance, had then a fleet at sea, and many of the Florentine Gibelins served on board it. This was of great service to Conradin in Sicily b: but that young prince was poor; and when he came to Trent he found himself obliged to dismiss his German army, all but three thousand horse; a force too small to subdue Tuscany, which his interest led him to have attempted. Being joined, however, by great numbers of the Gibelin faction, he insulted Lucca, but durst not fight the Florentine army which came to its defence, and harrafled him in his march to Sienna. The Florentines were commanded at this time by one of Charles's lieutenants, who, on his march to Arezzo, dismissed the Florentine horse with a kind of contempt of their services. Conradin's generals understanding this, formed an ambush against the Royalists, for so the party of Charles was called, between the Arno and the mountains, at the persuasion of the Florentine Gibelins who served under Conradin. This stratagem Army of was so effectual, that all the Royalists, but a few who had Charles or got over a bridge before it was seized by the Germans, were Anjon decut in pieces almost without resistance. This deseat was of feated. great service to Conradin's affairs, and he marched without opposition by Viterbo, where the pope still was, to Rome. It was in vain for the pope to launch out his thunders against him; for Conradin destroyed the territories of Viterbo before his eyes, and plundered all the estates of the Guelph saction. He was received at Rome by Don Henry with regal, or rather imperial honours. Charles, who knew he was hated in Italy, Progress of by this time had received a confiderable reinforcement of ve-Conradin, teran cavalry from France; and though his numbers were far inferior to those of Conradin, who had actually entered the kingdom of Naples, he resolved to give him battle, and both armies met at Aquila, or Alva, in Abruzzo. He knew, that excepting the Germans and the Florentine exiles, and some troops who followed Don Henry, the whole not amounting to fix thousand men, Conradin had but few soldiers in his a my, and that the rest, who were mostly composed of needy Italians, were under no discipline. He therefore placed a strong ambush behind a hill, out of the view of his enemies, who at first bore down all before them; but falling to plunder, as Charles had forefeen, he fell upon them with his ambushed troops, and totally descated Conradin, who had thought guba is dehimself sure of victory, and it was with difficulty he escaped feated; to Rome. But the victory at Alva had changed the face of affairs there, where the Guelph families of Ursini and Sabelli now prevailed; so that he was obliged to fly from Rome towards Pifa; but in his flight he was taken prisoner, with his cousin the duke of Austria, who had attended him in his expedition, and Don Henry of Castile. Being carried to Naples, Conradin and the duke of Austria, though both sovereign princes, were tried before the syndics of the cities of that kingdom, and condemned to die. It is hardly credible that Charles of Anjou, however ambitious he might be, would have put to death two innocent princes, the eldest of whom was not above seventeen years of age, had he not in a manner been intimidated into that cruelty by pope Clement IV. who, though then on his death-bed, fent him the famous apothegm, Conradi vita, Caroli mors, Caroli vita, Conradi mors, which fignifies " Conrad's life is Charles's death, Charles's life is Conrad's death." This detestable advice determined Charles to put the fentence in execution.

LEONARDS ARETINE Hift. Flor. pag. 44.

and with Austria executed.

On the twenty-fixth of October, 1268, the two young the duke of princes were led to a scaffold, erected in the market-place of Naples, together with Gerard of Pisa, who had commanded the Florentine Gibelius under Conradin at the late battle, with feveral other persons of distinction, and there they all of them lost their heads. The death of Conradin was particularly affecting. When he came upon the scaffold he threw his gauntlet amongst the people, desiring it might be carried to his cousin Peter of Arragon, who would revenge his death. He then inatched up the head of the duke of Austria. with whom the execution began, and, while he tenderly embraced it, his own was flruck off. It is faid that his gauntlet, or glove, was faithfully delivered by a German knight to Peter of Arragon.

WHILE those tragedies were acting, Tuscany was in a state rather of expectation than tranquility; but no sooner was the death of Conradin certified than both parties refumed their arms. A great many Florentine exiles still remained at Sienna; and early in the year 1269 they laid fiege to Colle, which is fituated upon the river Alfa, a branch of the Arno, and not far from Florence. The Florentines immediately fent some troops to the affistance of their allies, and though only the cavalry threw themselves into the place, the Siennese raised the fiege; but being pursued lost a great number of men, no quarter being given by the Florentines. The latter, that same year, besieged Ostina, which was garrisoned by the exiled Gibelins of Florence. Not finding the place tenable, they endeavoured to escape by night, but were intercepted, and most of them killed or taken prisoners. The Florentines after this joined their troops to those of Lucca, and laid waste the Pisan territories. This brought on a peace with the Siennese, who admitted a governor from Charles into their city, and agreed to give no harbour to any of the Florentine fugitives, who, in confequence of this peace, were obliged to retire towards the Capuan territories, where many of them were put to the fword by the Florentines and others, amongst whom was Actiolini, the son of the noble Farinata, were made priforers and fent to Florence, where they were capitally punished.

who

CHARLES of Anjou was now by far the most powerful Affairs of prince in Italy; but the death of Urban IV. and the intrigues Italy, that followed in the election of a new pope revived the troubles of Tuscany, where the Gibelins again got ground. Lewis king of France, notwithstanding his fanctity, far from blaming his brother for his inhumanity c, at this time undertook a crusade against the king of Tunis, on account of the friendship he had shewn to Conradin, and required his brother to attend him. This happened just at the time when the Florentines and Lucquese, not at all doubting of being asfifted by Charles, had made vast preparations for war against the Pifans, his and their determined enemies; but the views of Charles were very different from those of the Florentines. Being about to attend his brother, he studied to leave every thing in tranquility during his absence, and for that purpose fet out in person for Florence. All Italy thought the ruin of Pifa inevitable, as Charles daily expressed the most bitter rancour against that city: but he no fooner arrived in the Tuscan territories, than he gave a savourable audience to the Pifan deputies, who offered to affift him with ships in his African expedition. Upon this he not only made peace with Charles of them, but obliged the Florentines to do the fame. So unex- Anjou pected an event greatly diffatisfied the Florentines; but to ap-makes pease them Charles took and razed to the ground Boniti, or peace with Bonitium, which was the receptacle of all the Tuscan Gibe-the Pilans. lins. His governor Guido, however, obliged the Florentines to refund all the money that Charles had expended in the fiege and demolition of the place.

THE see of Rome still continued vacant; but the late peace Gregory between the Florentines and Siennese had entirely reconciled X. chosen those two people, when Lewis the French king died in his pope. African expedition, and Charles of Anjou returned to Italy, where he found things in great disorder. At last Theobald of Placentia, afterwards Gregory X. was chosen pope. It was he who indicted the council of Lyons, and he then repaired with a vast retinue to Florence, with a view, as he pretended, of abolishing all distinctions of party in Tuscany; but in reality to weaken the interest of Charles there. His election took place in the year 1271; and calling together all the leading men of Florence, he made them a very foothing speech, tending to persuade them to re admit the exiled Gibelius into their This the Florentines humbly, though firmly, opposed: but his holiness, being master there, he forced them to comply, and all the favour he shewed the governing party, was to oblige some of the heads of the Gibelin faction to give hoftages, that they would not make a bad use of the indulgence that had been shewn them. Notwithstanding his authority. and all the fulminations he pronounced against those who should break the peace, and his even founding a kind of temple of concord, to which he gave his own name; yet the chief Florentines remained vastly distatisfied with the peace that had been forced upon them, and the return of the exiles. who were so apprehensive of the power of their adversaries. that they again voluntarily left the city. This so greatly exasperated the pontiff, that he laid the remaining Florentines under an interdict from all facred functions. The Florentines, who feem originally to have embraced the papal cause, only because it was least dangerous to their liberties, were far from being intimidated by its thunders; and Florence continued under the interdict for three years, so that it is doubtful, fays their historian, which was most prevalent, the obstinacy of the pontiff, or the perseverance of the citizens.

C VOLTAIRE Histoire de l'Empire.

He alters the Florentine go. Yernment.

Affairs of Tulcany.

THE differences between the Guelphs and Gibelins in Italy, under this pope, who filled the papal chair four years, raged more than ever. The Florentines offered again to affift their friends of Bologna against their adversaries with troops; but the Bolognese refused to admit them into their city. The Pisans again expelled the Guelphs out of their territory, and they found shelter in Florence and Lucca. Their chief was count Ugolini, a man of vast consequence in Tuscany; and, notwithstanding the repeated menaces of the pope, the Florentines and Lucquese put him at the head of an army, with which he laid waste the estates of his enemies to the very. gates of Pifa. The pope at this time was holding the council of Lyons; and growing daily more and more uneasy at the power of Charles of Anjou, he wrote to the electors of the empire, commanding them to chuse an emperor, as that dignity had been in fact vacant fifteen years; threatening, if they did not agree in their election, to give, by his own authority, a head to the empire. Their choice fell upon Ro-Hapfburg dolph of Hapfburg, ancestor to the present house of Austria, chosen em. chiefly because he was so inconsiderable a prince, that the electors 3

perer.

flectors had nothing to fear from his power. This election happened in the year 1273; and the following year it was confirmed by the pope, whose friendship was of great service to Radolph.

THE imperial dignity being now filled, Charles of Anjou, Florence king of Naples, had no farther pretext for acting under the uniter an pope as imperial vicar in Tuscamy; and this was thought to be interdicta the great view the pope had in hastening the election of an emperor d. Gregory however could not be prevailed upon to remove his interdict from the Florentines, though by the swelling of the Arno he was obliged, upon his return out of France, to pass, against his will, some days in Florence. All he could be prevailed on to do was to give the people there his benediction, but without remitting their punishment. Removing from Florence to Arezzo, he there fell fick, and Death of died in 1276. He was succeeded by Innocent V. who took off the pope. his predecessor's interdict from Florence. The war between War with the Florentines and the Pisans still continued; and the latter the Pisans, had, with incredible labour, cut a ditch, which divided the territories of the two republics, and terminated at the mouth of the Arno. This ditch was fortified at certain distances with towers, and for some years it was of vast service to the Pisans against the incursions of the Florentines. The latter however at last discovered, in a dry season, that they could pass it by the channel of the Aino, which they did with a body of horse, and surprising the Pisans, they and their faithful allies the Lucquese cut in pieces great numbers of them, and drove the others to the gates of Pifa. allies then plundered all that rich territory; and were making dispositions for besieging Pisa itself, when the pope, by his legate, one Valasco a Spaniard, forced both parties into an . accommodation, by which count Ugolini and his friends were reinstated in their former honours and possessions in Pifa; and all the other matters of controverly between the two republies were referred to his holiness.

INNOCENT dying in the fourth month of his pontifi- Adrian V. cate, he was succeeded by Adrian V. who lived but a few chosen porce, days after his election; and his successor, John XXI. was and is the killed by an accident at Viterbo, in the fixth month of his pon-fourth in thicate: thus sour popes died in three years. The next three years. pope was Nicholas III. an Italian, of the noble house of Urfini, who was chosen in the year 1277. This spirited pontiff sollowed the plan chalked out by Gregory X. for reducing the power of Charles of Anjou and the French faction in Italy, and d Aretini, pag. 52.

. .

deprived him not only of his dignity of Roman senator, but of the vicariate of Tuscany. His holiness, at the same time, put his kiniman Bertolo Ursini at the head of some troops, to give the greater weight to the papal authority; and fent his legate Latino, who was very popular in Tuscany, to reconcile all the jarring interests there. The legate was a man of great address; and finding that the extravagance and haughtiness of some of the Florentine nobility had disgusted the magistracy, he artfully brought the latter over to agree to the recalling the exiled Gibelins, by which he conciliated all parties in the city to each other. After this, to make the reconciliation more lasting, he prevailed on the heads of each faction publicly to embrace one another, and to give reciprocal fecurities for preferving the tranquility of the state. His legate He then new modelled the Florentine government, by creatnew models ing a magistracy of fourteen persons, chosen indifferently out of both parties; ordered all the records and sentences against the exiles to be cancelled, and destroyed and took such other prudent measures, that they were restored to their estates and honours. In this reconciliation so much good faith was observed, that all the exiles returned to Florence, except about fixty families, whom the pope detained near Rome for a short time, till the accommodation should be fully established. But the interest of the holy see was not forgot in this negotiation: some forts or castles, as they are called, were put into the hands of his holiness, and Florence was obliged to receive from him every two years its magi-

Aracy.

S E C T. III.

Containing the History of Florence, after the new Plan of their Republic took place; their Wars with the Pisans, and Arezzians, and other Italian States; the Institution of the Office of Gonfalonier; and their Revolutions till the Year 1300.

Charles of T is formewhat surprising that a prince, so ambitious and Anjou re- powerful as Charles of Anjou was should so quietle as he powerful as Charles of Anjou was, should, so quietly as he figns the did, resign the vicariate of Tuscany, by which he had been vicariate enabled to do fo many great things, especially when we conof Tuffider the weakness of the emperor Rodolph, and the yet uncany. fettled state of his government. But Charles perceived the French growing every day more and more odious in Italy, and yet he could trust no others, nor was his own government over Naples and Sicily so secure as not to be shaken by the papal fulminations. Such were the confiderations that determined him to make no refistance, and to draw his troops out of Tuscany. As to the Florentines, the comprehensive system which had taken place, left them little to fear from the power of the pope, if he had inclined to make a bad use of it, while they continued united amongst themselves, and his protection was very useful to them against more dangerous masters. For two years the government of Florence went so smoothly on, that their historians tell us that nothing memorable at home happened during that time. In the year 1281 pope Nicholas III. died of an apoplectic fit at Viterbo; and differences arose to such a height in the conclave between the Italian and French factions, that the populace breaking into it, abused and imprisoned the friends of the late pope, whom they hated; but the choice at last fell upon a French cardinal, who took the name of Mar-Martin tin IV. and was a dependent of Charles of Anjou. In the IV. chosen mean while the emperor Rodolph, who was a wife and a pope. brave prince, had, by the concessions he made to pope Nicholas III. got possession of the government of Tuscany, which he managed by a deputy. This deputy, on his arrival, found he had little or no power there, especially at Florence and Lucca, and raised a body of Germans to enforce obedience to his commands. The Florentines, on the other hand, depended for protection on the new pope, and his countryman Charles of Anjou; and joining with the Lucquese, who still more violently opposed the imperial authority, they took and razed to the ground the town of Piscia, or Poggia, because it was in that interest; but the affairs of the pope, and his friend Charles of Anjou, taking an unfavourable turn, the Florentines resumed their usual jealousy of their governors. Perceiving the pope was no longer able to protect them against the growing power of the emperor, and that he fought rather to put them up to sale to the best bidder, they again changed their form of government, and abolished the The Flow authority of the fourteen magistrates, introduced by the legate rentines Latine. In their room they chose for their magistrates three change the minent citizens, whom they called the prefidents of the form of uriffs; in Latin, priores artium. This number was after-their gowards enlarged; and, in fact, it was little more than a re- vermment. sewal of their most antient form of government, after Florace aspired to be a republic, and somewhat resembled that of the Antiani. This form was chosen as being the most effectual curb upon the nobility of both parties. The presidents first chosen were men of plain, sober sense, and the most distinguished for industry, frugality, and simplicity of manners, and consequently for pacific dispositions. names were Bertolo Bardi, who was of a noble family, and very rich; Rosso Bacarelli, and Salvio Clari Jerome. three magistrates were obliged constantly to reside, or rather to be imprisoned, in the town-house, or guild-hall, without being suffered all the time of their magistracy, which was to last two months, to repair to their private houses. In other respects they were not unprovided with the badges of authority: their table and all their expences were defrayed by the public. They had twenty-four officers allowed them, of whom twelve ferved as messengers or beadles, for convoking the citizens to the public hall, and for executing the inserior duties of justice. As to the presidents themselves, the first charge they had from their constituents was, that during the time of their magistracy they should concern themsclves with nothing but the affairs of government. When the first two months of this new constitution were elapsed, fix prefidents were chosen, being one for each ward in the This was a year of scarcity and famine in the Florentine state, through the rains and inundations that had happened during the feed-time.

Affairs of Italy, THE Florentines still continuing refractory to the imperial authority, about this time received into their city the son of Charles of Anjou, in his return from France, with some troops to his sather's assistance, with great respect, and even lent him six hundred horse, to be employed in his Sicilian wars. This makes it necessary for us briefly to recount the history of that prince, so far as it is immediately connected with that of Florence.

and Sicily.

THE fatal success of the crusades in the Holy Land, had at this time cured the European princes of that passion; but in the course of them they became acquainted with the weakness of the Greek empire, and the degeneracy of its government; and Charles thought that it would be no difficult attempt to conquer Constantinople itself, provided he could ensure the quiet of his regal dominions during his absence. Sicily had been the most restractory; but after the deseat and death of Conradin he again reduced it; and he thought the only way to preserve the natives in subjection, was to keep them in misery. He therefore abandoned that noble island to the government of the most rapacious set of men, most of them Provençals, or Franchmen, that ever disgraced the human appearance.

The inflances of their avarice, luft, and cruelty, are numerous, and detestable beyond example. John de Procida, a gentleman of Salerno, of a good estate, but exercising at once the professions of law and medicine, found means to come to the knowledge of Charles's defign upon Constantinople, to which city he went in disguise, and had an interview with the emperor Michael Paleologus, who furnished him with money, and encouraged him in the projects he was meditating. He had the like interviews with Peter king of Arragen, who was married to Constance, daughter to Manfred; and Procida, who was devoted, to enthusiasm, to the memory of the house of Suabia, exhorted him so earnestly to revenge the blood of Conradin, that that prince and his queen fell in with all his views, which terminated in no less than a general massacre of all the French and Provençals in Sicily, at the first knell of the bell that was to call the Sicilians to the vespers the third day after Easter, in 1282. It is almost incredible that a project like this, so shocking in its own nature, should be communicated to above a hundred thoufand people for many months before it was put into execution, and yet be kept so inviolably secret, that not one of the destined victims came to the knowledge of it, or so much as suspected themselves to be in danger. No sooner did the satal knell found than the tragedy began, and so surjously incensed were the islanders at their tyrants, that they even massacred such of their own daughters as were pregnant by Frenchmen. Above eight thousand were massacred on this occasion. the mean while Peter of Arragon, under pretence of an expedition to Africa, had fitted out a fleet to support the revolt of the Sicilians, and the right of his wife to that island.

CHARLES of Anjou, according to the Florentine histo- Siege of rians, was in Lombardy to join his fon, when he heard of Messina, this dismal revolution; but immediately returning to Naples, he went from Reggio to Sicily, where he laid siege to Messina, the Florentine auxiliaries ferving under him. The siege was vigoroully pressed, and the place as vigorously desended, till it was telieved by Peter of Arragon, who obliged Charles to make a precipitate retreat to his ships. All the loss the Florentines applied is sustained on this occasion was a state tent, and their troops raised, are said to have returned undiminished home, where they were received with great joy.

FLORENCE at this time enjoyed an uncommon degree Proferous of tranquility, confidering the commotions that prevailed flate of through all the rest of Italy, and began to make no inconsi-Florence. derable progress in those fine arts that afterwards so greatly distinguished her. The imperial deputy in Tuscany, who leems.

feems never to have ventured himself within the walls of Florence, not being supported by his master, had desisted from harraffing the citizens, who, on the return of their cavalry from Sicily, held a kind of jubilee, by exhibiting plays and pageants, and entertainments of all kinds, at which both sexes appeared magnificently drest, the men in a white uniform, and the women in their richest apparel.

The Gethe Florentines against the Pifans.

THE next year, 1283, was observed to have been a busy noese join year amongst the Florentines, between whom and the Pisans the old animofities still subsisted. The Genoese at this time began to make so great a figure at sea, that they had defeated the Pisans on that element, and the Florentines thought that a lucky opportunity then presented for ruining the power of Pifa, both by sea and land, by entering into a league with the Genoese. They had received fresh provocation, by the affistance the Pisans had given to the imperial deputy, and by their invasions upon the properties of the Florentine allies; at least, those were made the pretexts for war. The Lucquese, who likewise had their quarrels with the Pisans, came into the same confederacy, as did several other petty states, and the storm fell at once upon Pifa by sea and land; the allied army carrying fire and fword to the walls of that city, and the Genoese fleet destroying their coasts, It does not however appear, that the allies this year obtained any other conquests than those over the open country of Pisa; for they returned home with a resolution to besiege that city next year with greater effect. The consternation however into which the Pisans were thrown, gave count Ugolini, whom we have already mentioned, an opportunity to become master of Pisa, and he undertook to pacify the Florentines, with whom he faid his countrymen had no differences, but the idle fantastical distinctions of party. By his address Florence was detached from the confederacy, and the weight of the war fell upon the Genoese and the Lucquese, by which, in all probability, Pisa was saved from destruction.

The Florentines cultivate : peace.

TRANQUILITY being thus again restored to Florence, her inhabitants wifely again applied themselves to the arts of peace, which, by making their city rich, rendered it so pothe arts of pulous that they were obliged to extend its walls. Public roads were laid out leading to the Cafantino, to Bologna, to Prato, and Pistoia, and each of those roads terminated in a most magnificent gate of the city. The Florentines, at the same time, erected pleasure-houses, for the first time, on the other side of the Arno; and these encreased so much, that they afterwards became part of the city, and were equally well fortified: here likewise three magnificent gates were creded, answering to three public roads, or causeways, leading to Pifa, Sienna, and Arezzo. This year Charles of Anjou died, after losing Sicily, and seeing his son the prince of Salarms a prisoner in the hands of his capital enemy, Peter of Aregen, who could not, for all that, make himself master of Naples, to which he had the same title as to Sicily.

THE tranquility of Florence was at last interrupted by the Ambition ambition of the bishop of Arezzo, who seized and fortified a of the bistrong castle, called in the history of the times Cecilia, lying for between the territories of Arezzo and Sienna, with a view of Arezzo. over-awing the Siemese, who, resenting this encroachment, called upon the Florentines for affishance. They readily sent them auxiliaries; and the place, which was naturally very strong, was befieged in form, the prelate, who had got together a body of troops, not daring to relieve it. The garrison however made a vigorous defence for five months, when, being prest by famine, they endeavoured to escape: but being intercepted by their enemies, most of them were cut in pieces, and the castle itself was razed to the ground, so that scarcely any memorial of it now remains.

HONORIUS IV. an Italian, of the house of Savelli, was now pope. The emperor Redolph had hitherto gained little or nothing by his pretended superiority over Florence; and this pope is faid to have encouraged him to make Foscano, a Tuscan nobleman, his deputy or governor there. Foscano accordingly repaired to Florence, and tried all the foothing arts he was master of, to induce them to submit to the imperial authority: but all was in vain; both the Florentines and the Arezzians appeared more determined than ever against any such subjection, and Foscano was obliged to leave Tuscany, greatly mortified by his ill success. The Arezzians, about this time, in imitation of the Florentines, had put themselves under the protection of one Guelfo, whom they created their president of the artists. This person, who was a sworn Bishop of memy to the nobility, not only expelled them from the Arezzo ity, but, wherever he could, levelled their castles and their besieged rouses to the ground, and at last besieged Civitella, the re- by the whence of the bishop, whose name was William, and who Guelphs, himself a noble Arezzian 8. This violence and barbarity nited in one common interest the Arezzian nobility, though efore greatly divided amongst themselves; and they drove e president and his army back into the city, which they enemies. As to the president, they put out his eyes, and exposed him to all manner of public contempt. means the bishop, at the head of his own family, the Paction and that of the Ubertini, became master of Arezzo, and expelled from thence all the commons, and such of the nobility as had formerly opposed him, or had only occasionally joined him. These applied, in the most pathetic manner, for affistance to the Figrentines, who, nobly mindful of the long subsisting friendship between the two states, immediately called together the deputies of the Lucquese, and their other allies, . , and it was agreed to lend the Arezzians eighty horse for their assistance, fifty of whom they immediately received. reinforcement enabled the Arezzian exiles to make incursions to the very walls of Arezzo, and to renew the war. The bishop, on his part, called to his assistance all his confederates, amongst whom were many discontented Florentines. year the war between Arezzo and Florence was renewed with greater fury than ever. The Siennese on this occasion joined the Florentines, whose warlike preparations were greater than had been known since their deseat at Arbe. The Arezzians were likewise very powerful, through great numbers of exiles, or rather malcontents, who joined them. These generally were nobility, who, difliking popular government, retired to the country, where, having great estates and followings, they lived in a kind of an independency upon the civil government. The Florentine army set out on its march the last day of May, and reduced a great many strong places, particularly Laterino, in their march to Arezzo, which they at last straitly belieged. Not being able to take the place, the Siennese and Florentines agreed to return home, each by the road leading to their own city. Their separation gave the befieged Arezzians an opportunity to make a fally upon the Siennese, who were completely defeated; and the Florentines

War with the Arezzians.

but takes

Arezzo.

Affairs of Pila.

to return home with their infantry.

The Florentines may, at this time, be said to have been the patrons of popular liberty, not only in Tuscany, but all over Italy. Count Ugolini having expelled the heads of the people out of Pisa, particularly another Ugolini, his kinsman, the exiles applied to the Florentines, who gave them affishance and support against their enemies. In the mean while the bishop of Arezzo, and his faction, had driven the banished Arezzians into such distresses, that they were obliged to shut themselves up within the walls of Carciano, where thought proper, after some consultation, to leave their cavalry at Laterine, to restrain the excursions of the enemy, and they must have furrendered themselves, had they not applied by their deputies to the Florentines for affistance, which was instantly sent them, without waiting, as usual, to consult The Flowith their allies. This generous reinforcement confifted of rentines eight hundred Florentine and two hundred mercenary horse, succour the and four thousand foot. The vast expedition with which this Arezzian army was raised, is a proof of the excellent government un- Guelphs; der which the Florentine state then was. Upon their approach the Arezzians raised the siege, and returned to Arezzo, where they received fuch reinforcements as rendered them greatly superior to the Florentines. The latter having gained the main end of their expedition, which was the relief of their allies, kept upon the defensive at Laterino. This gave their enemies an opportunity of extending their incursions even to Florence itself; and at last they laid siege to Varico, and laid every thing waste with fire and sword to Collina, which was but seven miles from Florence. The government there, understanding that many of their discontented nobility were in the Arezzian army, were suspicious of a correspondence between them and their friends in the city, and therefore redoubled their vigilance, without indulging their young citizens in the great defire they expressed to fally out and artack the enemy, who foon after raised the siege of Varico, and returned home loaded with plunder.

NEXT year, in the spring, the Florentines meditated a se- and make were revenge against the Arezzians for all their sufferings, and a league convoked a general affembly of their allies, who were the against the Siennese, the Lucquese, the Volterrans, the Pistoians, the Pra- Arezzians, tonese, and several others. All these perty states, as well as Florence and the greater ones, had by this time entered into a kind of compromise with the emperor Radalph (who found himself unable to reduce them) for their liberties, which confifted in the power of electing their own magistrates, raising their own troops, coining money, and modelling their own forms of government. Those privileges gave them as much independence as the emperor could bestow, and they are said to have been purchased by the Florentines at the expence of forty thousand golden ducats. This sum is a proof of the wealth and importance of Florence at this time, as Lucca gave but twelve thousand, and Genoa and Bologna but six thousand each, for the same privileges. ALL the allies had their particular causes of hatred towards who defend the Arezzians, who, on their fide, were very powerful. They themselves. were joined by Guido Ferentina, who was at that time master of Pifa, and by great numbers of noblemen from Umbria and Picento, and all the Florentine malcontents. Arezzo was the

ren-

Prince of Salerno vifits Florence.

rendezvous of their army. The bishop continued to be its general, and he was strongly supported by the powerful families of the Patti, Ubertini, and Tarlati. The opening of the campaign was attended, on the part of the Florentines, by the arrival of the prince of Salerno, fon to Charles of Anjou, in their city. This prince had regained his liberty by the fayour of queen Conftance, and feems to have come to Florence, in his way to Rome, chiefly to know what affiftance he could depend upon from the Florentines for recovering his father's crown. He was received in that city with extraordinary respect; but that was all he obtained, excepting a strong escorte of Florentine horse, who attended him to the Siennese territories, to protect him from the infults of the Arezzians. Charles, before his departure, recommended to them an experienced officer, Americo, (perhaps Americo, of Narbonne, and the ancestor of the famous navigator Americus, who was a Florentine) to the Florentines for their general. They accepted of this recommendation; but nominated a council of fix of their most eminent citizens, who were to attend him in the nature of field-deputies, and who were to approve of his operations. A council of war being held, it was agreed that the army should cross the Arno, and march by the Casantino, by which they fell into Novello's estates, and destroyed them, he having always taken part with their enemies. As the Arezzians had expected the Florentines, as usual, on the other side of the Arno, the latter had sufficient time for revenging upon their territories, towards the Casantino, all the devastations they had committed upon those of Florence the year before. The Arezzians were surprised at the boldness of their enemy's march through so mountainous a country; the first intimation of which they had was from the peasants, who fled in consternation from the desolated estates to Arezzo h. The Arezzian The Arez- army, upon this dismal intelligence, marched to Bibienna; their numbers being eight thousand foot and nine hundred their allies horse, commanded by the bishop and Bona of Feretri, and other excellent officers. This army was inferior to that of their enemies; but their generals had so great an opinion of its discipline and courage, that they resolved immediately to give battle, and were met with equal dispositions on the side of the Florentines. Both armies encountered on a plain, called by the inhabitants Campaldini; and neither interrupted the other in forming its order of battle. The Florentines placed their cavalry, in which they were strong, in their front. Their infantry formed the second line; and those two first

zians and defeated. and their bilhop flain.

h Leonardi Aretiki Hift. Flor. p. 62.

lines were flanked by archers, and such of the foot as carried shields, called in Latin scutati. A body of reserve of the Pistoians, and their other allies, under Cursio Donati, a Florentine knight, formed the third line. The disposition of the Arczaians was the same; but their troops were out-flanked by those of the Florentines.

BOTH armies being drawn up in order of battle, a Floren- Noble betime nobleman, one Vario Circuli, a man of great quality and baviour of fortune, fet an example of patriotism and magnanimity, far a Florenmore instructive to a generous mind than the relations of tine noblebattles, and other operations of war. By the post he held in man. the army, he was to chuse the squadron of horse that was to form the van, and to guard the grand standard; a service so dangerous, that the boldest in their army seemed to shrink Vario being required to name his men, named first from it. himself (though he was then ill of the gout), then his son, and then his grandson; but refused to name any more, giving for his reason, that " they who loved their country would offer themselves." This generous declaration produced such emulation through the Florentines, that they crouded for the glory of ferving in the van, which that day confifted of one hundred and fifty horsemen, of whom twenty were knighted on the field of battle. The Arezzian cavalry, being better armed and disciplined, made so furious a charge on that of their enemies, that they drove them back on their infantry; but the Arezzians incautiously continuing their pursuit, they were, in a manner, inclosed by the right and left flanks of the Flerentine army, while their own infantry was at too great a diffance to support them. The Arezzian horse, however, made so gallant a resistance, that they were upon the point of being joined by their foot, when Cursio Donati, in disobedience of his orders, charged the enemy at the head of the Pisteians of the third line, with this noble expression, " If we die, we can fear no farther penalty; if we conquer, let our accuser impeach us at Pistoia." The attack he made upon the Arezzians was fo critical and well-judged, that it turned the fortune of the day; for the Arezzians were every. where cut in pieces, or betook themselves to slight. Novello was amongst the first who left the field, which the bishop obstinately kept, though he might have retreated with safety to Bibienna, saying, he would never abandon those who had followed him into danger. At last, after performing amazing acts of valour, he was killed, together with Bono of Feretri, and many of the chief Arexxian nobility, with above three thousand of their common men, and about two thousand were taken prisoners. This battle was fought on the eighteenth of June, 1287.

Dante the poet's account of the battle.

THE above account of this memorable battle, taken from Leonardi Aretini, agrees perfectly well with the relation given of it by Dante, the celebrated poet, who was then a young man, and that day ferved in the Florentine army. He fays, in one of his letters, that the flaughter made of the enemy threatened to exterminate the Arezzian name. The fruits of this victory were, the reduction of the town of Bibienna, which was difmantled, and other places belonging to the Arezzians. Those advantages cost the victors dear, because, had they immediately after the battle marched against Arezzo, that city must have fallen into their hands; but the inhabitants now gaining eight days, in which they recovered from their consternation, they prepared for a vigorous defence. The Florentines, sensible of the oversight they had committed, sought to repair it; and even two of their presidents went into the trenches, a thing never heard of before, to encourage and direct the affailants. The belieged, however, taking advantage. of a dark tempestuous night, sallied out, and burnt all the wooden towers that had been erected by the besiegers, who thereupon returned to Florence, where they were received in triumph; and the armour of the Arezzian bishop was hung; up as a trophy in the ancient temple of Mars. When the Florentine magistracy wrote or spoke of this victory in public, they termed it their victory over the Gibelins, lest they should offend the delicacy of their Arezzian friends.

The Florentines miscarry . Arezzo.

THOSE successes seem to have inspired the Florentines with too great a passion for conquest. They sent, soon after their return, two thousand foot and four hundred horse to the affiftance of the Lucquele and Pilan exiles, without having any connection with them, but as they were sufferers for potempt upon pular government. The exiles, with this affistance, wasted the Pisan territory; but could not take that city. Tarlati, a nobleman of great distinction, was then master of Arezzo, which the malcontents within the city had agreed to betray to the Florentines, who for that purpose sent a strong body of horse to Civitella. The design, however, was discovered by one of the conspirators, who had been mortally wounded, to a priest, who discovered it to Tarlati; and such measures were taken for the defence of the city, that the Florentine troops were obliged to return home.

> A VAST improvement of the Florentine government took place this year. By its constitution the nobility was not excluded from posts of power and trust in the state; but a

DANTE, Epist. xxi.

nobleman who was qualified to be a magistrate of Florence, was required to be of some particular trade; the law excluding all idle persons, plebeians as well as nobles, from being prefidents. By this means an unnatural kind of a diftinction arose in the state, that between property, which was in the nobles, and power, which was vested in the commoners, or rather artists; for so the Florentines chose to call all kinds of tradesmen and merchants, as well as the professors of the finer arts, who were every day increasing in Many of the nobility, about this time, laying out their fortunes in commerce, had great returns of profit from France, England, Germany, and other nations. The riches they acquired made them impatient under the government of those whom they looked upon to be no better than mechanics; and sometimes they insulted them, while the magistrates were deterred, by the numerous retinues always attending those noblemen, from vindicating their own authority. For this reason the Florentines chose a new magistrate, who was to bear the standard of justice, and who afterwards was called the Gonfalonier of Justice; and his office was to call the Institution people out to attend his standard, in all cases of the breach of the of the peace, which could not be remedied in the ordinary flandard. court of justice. This constitution took place seven years bearer. after that of the presidents of the artists; but as it was a post of great power, the Florentines were excessively jealous of the exercise of it, and limited its duration in one person to two months, and none but a plebeian or commoner could exercise it. Four counsellors were appointed to affish him, two colonels to serve under him, and he was to command a thousand men, who were chosen out of the different wards of the city. That of Scardi furnished two hundred; that of Transarnini two hundred; and each of the other four wards one hundred Those thousand soldiers were to serve for a year, and fifty. and obliged, when required, to follow the standard of justice. None of the nobility could be of the number, and severe penalties were inflicted on all who should obstruct or threaten them. But this formidable military force was to be under the direction of the civil magistrate; nor could it be arrayed by the gonfalonier, without an order from the presidents, or in any other case but in that abovementioned.

THE Florentines that same year gave another proof of Other retheir wise vigilance over public liberty, by making a law that gulations. no president should be re-chosen in a shorter time than three years after his former magistracy was expired. The reason Aretin * assigns for this institution is, that the posts of honour in the state might be accessible to the greater number of citizens.

LEONARDI ARETINI, Hift. Flor. p. 65. Ib. p. 67.

A. D. 1288. against Arezzo.

WHILE the Florentines were thus concerting the means of preserving their constitution, they still were possessed of a Expedition spirit for foreign conquests; and next year, viz. 1288, they again invaded the territories of Arezzo, and destroyed Novello's estates in the Casantino; but being unable to take Arez-20, they and their confederates returned home, after an unmanly expedition against a defenceless country. The season of the campaign, however, not being over, at their return they and the Lucquese, with their consederate cities, renewed their league with the Genoese against Pisa; and the Genoese being possessed of forty gallies, the Pisans, who were their rivals in commerce, received many fatal blows. Leghorn at that time belonged to Pifa; and the confederates not only took it, but funk two ships loaded with ballast in the mouth of the harbour, to obstruct its navigation. The Florentines, we are told, at the same time took and garrisoned several places belonging to the enemy near Arici. But no sooner did the Florentine army return home, than Guido of Feretri, the Pisan general, without any loss, retook all the places the Pisans had lost. Not contented with that, in the dead of winter, Guida surprised and made himself master of a strong fortification. Till that time which the Florentines had erected near Arici. the Florentines had served in the wars against Pisa as the allies of the Lucquese; but they now declared themselves to be principals. Their military virtues, however, at this period, do not appear to be equal to their civil; and, to fay the truth, the art of war was then very low all over Italy. Early in the Degeneracy spring the Florentines, as it were, stung with rage, snatching of military up their arms, again invaded the territories of Pisa, and, as usual, laid waste the open country; but the rains prevented amongst the their farther progress, and they were obliged to return home. Those and the other expeditions they undertook about this time were so tumultuary, and so ill-conducted, that the names of their generals are not preserved in history. Upon the return of their army to Florence, the Florentines began to see the necessity of having a man of military reputation at the head of their troops; but they seem to have been somewhat fly of entrusting so great a power with one of their own They therefore chose Gentili Urfini, a Roman countrymen. nobleman, to be their general; and he brought along with him some disciplined troops from the campania of Rome. We know, however, of no great success he had in the field; for though the Florentine troops, and those of their allies, who now joined them, were very numerous, and exasperated be-

paor

their idle expeditions.

A. D.

1289.

virtue

Floren-

tines:

gond measure against the Pisans, yet Guido of Feretri, who commanded at Pisa, giving them no opportunity to fight, all that the confederates could do was to insult their enemics within their walis, renew their ravages upon the open country, and then return home.

IT appears, from the Florentine historians, that their nobility at this time were too powerful to be restrained by the new office of gonfalonier. The spirit of crusading was then over in Italy, and it was filled with foldiers of fortune and idle people, whom the great riches of the Florentine nobility enabled to take into their pay; and thus two factions still continued in the flate, that of the nobility, and that of the ple-The magistracy itself, being partly composed of nobility, was not sufficiently active in suppressing the tyranny of that order, and every day produced some new insult upon the people; so that it was evident to the more discerning Floren- They extines, that the moment the nobility were united amongst clude the themselves, they would become masters of the government. chief nebi-On the other hand, one cannot read the Florentine historians hit from of this time, without more than suspecting, that the people all share of were too much intoxicated with the thoughts of their own the governimportance, and that they often complained without reason. ment, One Fanus Labella, of a decayed but illustrious family at Flo- by the inrence, undertook the patronage of the people on this occa-fluence of fion: and perhaps the fallen lustre of his family somewhat in-Labella. fluenced his acrimony against the powerful nobility. Being a man of eloquence and abilities, he found means to convoke a general affembly of the citizens in the town-hall, where he laid open the danger the liberties of the people were exposed to by the power of the nobility, and proposed that the military establishment under the gonfalonier should be increased to four thousand men, and that he should reside in the town-house or guild-hall along with the presidents. He likewise proposed to exclude the most powerful of the nobility, even such of them as exercised trades, from being presidents.

This speech was heard with great applause, and agreed to; and many noble families, both within and without the city, were not only immediately disqualified from the magistracy, but the presidents were invested with a power of disqualifying others, if they thought proper. When the next election of magistrates took place, Janus was chosen a president, and Baldo Ruffuli gonfalonier. Being a man of spirit, and having now four thousand men under his command, be began the exercise of his magistracy with an act of justice; for hearing that a plebeian had been put to death by a nobleman of the family of the Galli, he drove them out of the state, demolished their houses, and laid waste their lands. This vigour struck such terror into the nobility, that they grew more moderate; and the people at the same time began to alter their system, which hitherto had been too warlike... They considered that their new form of government was yet in its infancy, and that their nobility always gained ground in time of war; they therefore liftened to a proposal for peace made by the Pifans 1, who were now greatly reduced. pacific disposition of the Florentines astonished and discon-- certed the Lucquese, and their other allies; but all their remonstrances were in vain. The Florentines named two of their citizens, Guadagni and Paradifi, for their plenipotentiaries, and they rather prescribed than made a peace. of the terms were, that all the exiled Pifans should be reinstated in their fortunes and privileges; that the Pisans should chuse their magistrates only from the states that were in alliance with Florence; and that the Florentines should have free liberty of exporting and importing their commodities to all the territories and harbours belonging to Pifa. likewise stipulated, that Guido of Feretri and all his troops should be dismissed from the service of Pifa.

Their and magnificence.

A. D. 1291.

Those and a great many other stipulations appeared for tranquility hard to the Pifans, that it was with great difficulty they were carried into execution. After this, Florence enjoyed a state of tranquility for a whole year. Two Florentine popes were created about this time, Celestine V. and Boniface VIII. latter was one of the most haughty pontiffs that ever filled the papal throne. About the same time the Florentines built their magnificent church of the Holy Cross at Florence, in a taste and with a grandeur uncommon to that age. They were, however, corrupted by the prosperity and tranquility they enjoyed, and both magistracy and people were equally infected. The great credit which their patriot Labella had now obtained in the government, had procured him vast envy from many of the plebeians, as well as all the nobility; and his enemies had interest enough to chuse some of their own number to be presidents of the republic. A fray happened, in which a plebeian was killed; and the nobleman who had been tried for the murder was acquitted, after a legal trial. This acquittal left no room for the interpolition of the gonfalonier's power; but the people, running to arms, accused the judges of corruption, and marched to Labella's house, demanding that he would head them. His advice was, that they should apply to the presidents, and obey their directions m.

1 LEONARDI ARETINI Hift. Flor. p. 69. " Ib. p. 71.

The headstrong mob; instead of following his counsel, ran to the town-house, broke open its doors, and committing a vast number of other violences, the enemies of Labella pretended that all their irregularities had proceeded from his They were supported by the great credit and influence of the nobility, and Labella was accused before the presidents, who were his enemies, of treason against the state. His authority amongst the people was so great, that a civil war must have ensued; but Labella prevented it by a magnanimity that would have done honour to the greatest patriot that Greece or Rome ever produced, by chusing a voluntary Labella banishment, rather than disturb the tranquility of the state. banished. Before his departure, he publicly embraced his friends in the most affectionate manner, bidding them adieu. His brother Tedde and his grandson Rainerio were banished at the same time, and their estates and houses laid waste.

This ingratitude, the reigning discase of popular govern- Diffentions ment, had almost ruined the republic of Florence. Labella break out had always been confidered as the bulwark of the people again beagainst the nobility, who; seeing him and his friends driven sween the into banishment, thought nothing could then refift them. nobles and They met in a body; they agreed to compose all differences the temple. amongst themselves; to lay the hardships they suffered before the magistracy; and, if they did not find redress, to have recourse to force. They accordingly made their application to the prefidents; But found so obstinate a resistance on the part of the people, that they called out their followers, and put themselves in arms. They were easily distinguished from the commons by the beauty of their horses, the splendour of their arms, and their armorial bearings, which were richly embroidered on their upper habits. They divided themselves Into three bodies; of whom one took its stand at the ancient temple of Mars; another at the New Exchange or Square, and the third at the end of the Upper Bridge across the Arns. The people, no way daunted at this military appearance. barricaded the streets; and whenever the nobility began to move. Inowered upon them darts and stones from the tops and windows of their houses; so that the others were obliged to remain on the defensive. At last, some moderate citizens interposing, the nobility laid down their arms; and the people; at the persuasion of the presidents, gave up a very sew inconfiderable points; on which both parties retited for that time Such, however, was the antipathy between the two orders, that the plebeians, reflecting on what they had done, upbraided their presidents with the concessions they had prevailed on them to make; and not only infulted them when MOD. HIST. VOL. XXXVI, they they went out of their office, but in a manner obliged their fucceffors to revoke all the concessions that had been made to the nobility.

Labella's recal proposed.

THEY even went farther, and, according to their usual inconstancy, they proposed the recalling Labella from banishment. They attributed to his absence all the late attempts of the nobility; and the latter, confidering themselves as being undone, applied for protection to pope Boniface VIII. who, glad of every opportunity to exert or extend his power, ordered the people of Florence, on pain of his displeasure, not to recal Labella, whom he termed a fomenter of sedition amongst the citizens, or any of his friends, to Florence. The Florentines were then too great flaves to papal power to dispute

He dies in this order; and thus that worthy patriot was suffered to die. exile. in exile, his very enemies compassionating his fate n.

A. D. 1208. Maguifithe Florentines,

An interval of tranquillity succeeded for about two years. during which the noble genius of the Florentine plebeians appeared with amazing luttre. Their first care was to renew. cent works their engagements with the neighbouring states, and they took erested by Perugia into the confederacy. They then applied themselves at once to strengthen and to adorn their state and city. They built the towns of St. Giovanni and France, on the opposite banks of the Arno. They erected, for the residence of theirpresidents and magistrates, a most magnificent new townhouse, their former one being too weak to protect them from the infults of the nobility. This palace, the noblest perhaps. at that time in Europe, was erected partly upon the ground of forfeited estates, and partly upon the scites of other houses. which were purchased by the public for that purpose. They. next completed the fortifications of their city, by carrying round it a long strong wall, with towers and bastions at proper distances; and, lastly, they laid out five thousand crowns in erecting a commodious airy prison, which was built upon the ground of forfeited estates. Those splendid works, and the flourishing state of commerce at Florence, rendered the Florentines now so respectable, that the people of Bologna and Ferrara, then at war with one another, offered to refer their

wbo mediate beand the Ferrarese.

tween the differences to their arbitration. The Florentines, by permiffion. Bolognese of the pope, accepted of the office; but under his patronage. and direction, he pretending that the two cities, as being fiefs: of the Holy See, depended upon him. The Florentines, on this occasion, fent no fewer than feven ambassadors, partly nobility, and partly plebeians, to his holinefs, and in a short time composed all their differences. We are now come to the year 1300, when pope Boniface VIII. celebrated the first centurial jubilee ever known in the christian world.

ARET. Hist. Flor. p. 72.

SECT. IV.

Containing the History of the Civil Wars of Florence between the Nobility and the People; the Usurpations of the Popes upon their Liberties; their Lagues with the other States of Tuscany; their Election of Prince Robert of Naples for their General; and their Wars with the neighbouring States, farticularly with the famous Castruccio Castruccani of Lucca.

N the year 1300 there flourished at Pistoia 2 noble family, New dicommonly called Cancellari; the branches of which, being visions in at variance with one another, were distinguished by the ridi- Florence. culous appellations of the Whites and the Blacks, and daily deirmiches and murders happened between the two parties; so that Pissoia was in danger of being destroyed, when the Florentines, its ancient allies, offered their affiftance towards refloring its tranquility. This being accepted by the Piftrians, the only expedient the Florentines could device for that purpose was to oblige both parties to remove to Florence; but as Aretin elegantly observes, Florence was rather insected than Pissoia cured by this measure. The families thus removed, communicated their refentments to many Florentine families with whom they had intermarried; and Florence, in a short time, became as much divided between the Whites and the Blacks as Pistoia had been before, and was equally filled with tumults, family being divided against family, brother against brother, and father against son; and thus the Guelphs split into parties.

GREAT heart-burnings had for some time been harboured The pope by the rival families of the Circuli and the Donati; but they mediates now broke out into action, the former taking part with the an agree-Whites, and the latter with the Blacks. The more moderate ment.

nobility and citizens, to prevent the consequences, applied to the pope, who enjoined Vario Circuli, the head of that samily, to accommodate matters with Curso Donati; but all was to no purpose: civil broils ensued, blood was shed, and the city filled with armed troops. Florence being in so dangerous a situation, the pope sent his legate to compose matters; but the Circuli, who were it seems the most powerful party, refusing to stand to his award, he put the city under an interdict, and left it. After his departure, greater violences were committed than ever; for the parties, now throwing off all reverence for government, no longer fought accidentally, and in a tumultuous manner; but drew up in regular bodies, one against another, in squadrons and companies. The great dependence of the Donati, who were of the black party, was upon Cursio Donati, esteemed the best soldier in Florence; and he answered their expectations, by always leading his party to victory. The Circuli, however, had the greatest interest in the magistracy, whom they prevailed upon to send a deputation to his holiness, requesting his interpolition for restoring the tranquility of their city. The Donati no sooner heard of this resolution than they again took arms, accused the magistrates of betraying the independency of the city. and threatened to punish them; and thus civil diffension flamed higher than ever.

[•] LEON. ARET. Hift. Flor. p. 73.

péet.

DANTE the poet happened that year to be one of the Dante the presidents, and being a man of great resolution, as well as eloquence, he had more fway than any other with his colleagues. He had the spirit to advise them to call the citizens in general to arms, and then to punish and expel from Florence the disturbers of her peace. This advice was followed: Cursio Donati was exiled, and his goods confiscated, for having threatened the magistrates. The proceedings against his abettors and friends were more moderate, they being only fined and sent to Perugia, where they were ordered to remain for some time, till they should be recalled by the people. Others of the nobility were likewise censured; but more for form-fake than justice. Some of their heads, amongst whom was Guido Cavalcanti, a Florentine philosopher of great learning and knowledge in the fine arts, were fent to Seranza; from whence, however, they were quickly recalled; but Cavalcanti died soon after.

Curlia Donati's intrigues.

A. D. 1302.

CURSIO DONATI was not idle during his exile. He went to the pope, and by his address, eloquence, and affiduity, he prevailed with his holiness to interpose in the affairs of Florence, though he and his party had been expelled for opposing that very resolution. The pope, therefore, prevailed upon Charles of Valois, brother to the king of France, Philip the Fair, to march into Italy, and to take upon him the pacification of Tuscany, where the Pistoians, the Lucquese, and other cities confederated with Florence, were still filled with blood and tumult on account of the two parties. His holiness was then at Anagni, where he gave his charge to Charles, who set out for Florence about the middle of September, attended by a body of regular troops. The faction of the the Whites, who were now masters of Florence, not expecting an armed mediation, were terribly disconcerted with the arrival of Charles, who was suspected of having entered into Charles of private terms with Cursio. Being however professedly Guelphs, Valois en. they did not chuse to deny him admittance into their city; ters Flobut received him, when he was near the gates, with vast ho-rence. nours and rejoicings. Charles, some days after his entrance, behaved with great modelty and appearance of justice. ordered his troops to lay afide their arms, and never to appear in bodies; and calling a general meeting of the magistracy and people, he prevailed with them to give him full powers to regulate them as he pleased. After this, he took an oath that he would make no other use of this power, than to restore justice and tranquility to the state; but no sooner was he established in the government than he appeared in public, and upon his tribunal, furrounded by a formidable body of his guards under arms.

IT is difficult, at this time, to affign the true motive of His conduct Charles's conduct on this occasion. The most probable con-there. jecture is, that he gave encouragement to both parties, yet affifted neither; that the citizens might be so weakened as to invite him to take upon himself the perpetual government of Florence, which would foon be followed by that of all Tuscany. For when Charles appeared attended with his guards, the people of all factions ran to arms; but being without any plan or leader, they durst not attack him, and he remained on his tribunal without offering to disperse them. In the mean while Cursio Donati, with a body of men, broke into Florence, and, being joined by his friends there, they marched to the public hall, where they deposed the presidents, and degraded them to the rank of private persons. After this, the now prevailing party proceeded against their antagonists with fire and sword; Charles appearing all the while as an unconcerned spectator, and without any emotion hearing the reproaches of the people against him. Though the return and the triumphs of the Donati undoubtedly were effected by his connivance or direction, yet he entered fecretly into treaty with the opposite faction; which the magistracy and people discovering, the Donati found means to drive into exile the heads of the Circuli and their abettors; and thus the Blacks remained mafters of the Florentine magistracy.

In the mean while the pope's legate returned to Florence; Hostilities and the hostilities between the two parties, not being confined rage more within the walls of the city, had filled all its territory with than ever conflagrations and murders. The legate fought to reconcile in Flothe two parties; but was so violently opposed by the Donati, rence.

that he laid the city under a fresh interdict, and lest it. . Amongst the leaders of the exiled faction was the poet Dante. whose fate was particularly severe and unjust. He had, on account of his great abilities, been fent ambaffador to the pope by the Florentines, to inform his holiness of the true state of their affairs, and to propose a plan of accommodation: but the Donati getting the better in Florence, he was, in his absence, accused and condemned, his house was rifled, and his estates were plundered. As to Charles of Valois, he feems intirely to have mistaken his measures. grew jealous of him, or, at least, did not support him suffciently to make good the government or vicariate of Tuscany he had given him; and, after five months abode at Florence, he recalled him to expel the Spaniards out of Sicily.

Charles leaves Florence. nubere the Donati prevail.

His departure lest the Denati, or black faction, nothing to fear; and they immediately resolved to drive the Whites from Pistoia, where they were most numerous. For this purpose they joined their forces with the Lucquese; but all they could do was to deseat the scattered parties of the exiled Whites; and, after taking some of their castles, they returned to Flerence with great shew of victory and triumph. That city was then in an unhappy fituation; for though it had reverted to its popular form of government, yet, in fact, it received law from the Donati, who put several of the principal citizens to death, and drove others into exile, on pretence of their conspiring against the public liberty. They soon experienced the bad policy of this proceeding; for the exiles became so numerous as to be formidable to the governing party at Florence, who were far from being united among ? themselves. The Bolognese took part with the exiles, and the confederacy amongst them being formed, they raised a great army, with which they marched against Florence, hoping, through the civil disputes in the city, to become masters of it. The citizens, however, hearing of the approach of the enemy, summoned the Lucquese and their ancient allies to their affistance, and boldly marched out to give battle to the enemy, who were waiting in hopes that the gates of the city would be opened to them; so great was their dependence upon They defeat its intestine commotions. Being disappointed, consternation

nefe.

the Bolog- succeeded their confidence, and they took flight without fighting, leaving the Florentines in possession of their camp and many noble prisoners, most of whom were put to death at Florence.

A. D. 1304.

THE succeeding year the Florentines and the Lucquese again laid siege to Pistoia; but they neither were able to take it, nor to bring the enemy to a battle. The civil wars that now prevailed over all Tuscany, with the inclemency of the seasons, had introduced a famine among the Florentines, who were A famine obliged to purchase with ready money twenty-seven thousand in Flomeasures of corn from Sicily and Calabria. But no sooner was rence. Florence freed from famine, than the relapted into domestic distractions. Curso Donati, thinking himself neglected by his fellow-citizens, and that he was not sufficiently preferred Discontent in the government, moved that the state of the public money of Cursio should be laid before the people. Though it had been greatly Donati. embezzled, yet the motion was unseasonable, and made only upon feditious motives, to bring certain leading magistrates to punishment, for obstructing his ambition. The measure. however, was so plausible, that Lothario P, bishop of Florence, at first befriended it; and the malcontents of both parties, who were very numerous, united under Cursio. But the real views of the latter appearing, the bishop employed all his interest against the motion; and not only the magistrates, but the other heads of the Donati family, put themselves in arms against Cursio. His party was still so prevalent, that, after a vast number of robberies and murders had been committed on both sides, the Lucquese were forced to interpose, by marching into Florence such an army as must have turned the scale of victory in favour of the faction they espoused, But they acted with great moderation; and partly by threats, and partly by persuasions, they in some measure restored the public tranquility. They next applied themselves to reform and prevent the abuses of government, and twelve presidents were elected instead of fix.

BENEDICT, who was then upon the papal throne, took it Nicholas. amis that those commotions should be appealed without his cardinal of intervention, and fent Nicholas of Prato, a cardinal, as his Prato, sent legate to Florence. This prelate, examining into the grounds legate to of the late differences, took part with the people, whom he Florence: persuaded to divide themselves into twenty companies, each company to have a gonfalonier, or standard-bearer, a colonel, and a standard adorned with the arms and badges of the company. Severe penalties were decreed against all who did not follow their respective standards as soon as they appeared in Each gonfalonier was to hold his place for fix months, and, while the standard was abroad, no person who followed it was to go to his own home. This last regulation was made, in order to deter the nobility from enrolling themfelves into the companies. Each gonfalonier was to affift the members of his own company by force of arms, if the case be newmodels its government;

P LEONARDI ARETINI Hift. Flor. p. 78.

required it, against the oppressions of the great; and if a nobleman killed a plebeian, the next relation of the deceased, if poor, was to be affifted with money to revenge his kiniman's death, at the expence of the company to which he belonged: but if one plebeian killed another, the survivor was to be delivered up to the common courts of justice. The like institutions took place in the Florentine territories without the

his main purpose,

THE legate having, by those regulations, obtained a great degree of popularity in Florence, proceeded to execute the But fails in principal defign of his legation, which was to persuade the citizens to recal the Circuli, and the other exiles, from their banishment. The chief of them resided at Axezze; and amongst them were Danie the poet, and the father of Petrarch, the other famous Tuscan poet of that age, who was born at Arezzo during his father's exile. Vario Circuli was at the fame time there; and by his advice the exiles, who continued to be very numerous, had chosen Alexander, count of Romena, to be their head. The legate did not find the Florentines inexorable on this head; but the affair turned out to be more difficult than was at first imagined. The exiles committed their concerns to the legate, who might eafily have succeeded in restoring the white party; but insisting upon the Gibelin exiles being restored at the same time, he succeeded in neither? though he was supported in both by a strong party of nobility and commons within the city. The exiles had appointed a deputation to wait upon the legate; but while the treaty was going forward, they pretended an invitation under the legate's own hand, which they produced; but whether q genuine or forged, our author does not determine. It was in vain for the legate to make the most solemn protestations of his innocence and good intentions; for at once he lost his popularity, and was obliged to retire to Prate. He found no shelter there; and returning to Florence, he attempted to prevail with the citizens to undertake an expedition against Prate. The Florentines discovered, or thought they discovered, that the army he wanted to raise was to be employed against their liberties, and refusing to obey him, he was forced to leave and retires. Florence, and repair to his master the pope. His departure was followed by a fresh eruption of civil diffentions, in which Curfie Donati took no part, he having left his friends, who were strengthened by the accession of two great families, that of the Junii and the Medici. The two parties took arms,

4 Leonardi Aretini Hist. Flor. pag. 80.

and, after many partial skirmishes, they came to a general

the corn market. The north wind blew at that time very firong against the quarter where the houses of the white faction stood, which one Nerio Abbasi, of the black party, observing, he set the houses of the Capensacci on fire; and the stames spread with such sury, that they consumed seventeen hundred houses, and was stopt only by the interposition of the Arno. This vast loss falling on the trading quarter of the city, the quantities of the rich merchandizes and commodities thereby destroyed is incredible; and the violence with which the stames proceeded, made the common people believe the constagration was assisted by enchantment.

The party of the Whites was now utterly subdued within The same

the city; but the cardinal legate, exasperated at the affronts summons he had met with, represented the Florentines in so odious a the Flolight to the pope, that he summoned twelve of the principal rentines to men of the city, amongst whom was Cursio Donati, to appear appear bebefore his tribunal at Perugia, where he then was. The fore bim. Florentines long debated whether they should obey this summons, which seemed to be intended to give the Whites a fayourable opportunity to re-enter the city, during the absence of their chief enemies. But at last, rather than be thought guilty, they obeyed it, and fet out with magnificent retinues to Perugia. Their apprehensions, however, were well-grounded. No fooner were they arrived, and had entered upon the vindication of their conduct, than the legate privately wrote to the heads of the other party, advising them to seize on that opportunity of reinstating themselves in the city. They accordingly assembled, to the number of nine thousand foot, and seventeen hundred horse, great part of whom were Bo-logness and Arezzians. They marched so secretly, that they came to the gates of Rhorence, without being discovered, about fun-fet, and actually forced their way into the city, But they were not unanimous: the Whites were jealous of their confederates, who were Gibelins; and they began to debate upon the manner of their proceeding. This created delay. which gave the citizens time to collect their strength, and they attacked their invaders so briskly, that they drove them but of the city before the Belognese troops, who had been left at some distance, could come up to support them. In their retreat some were killed; but they were joined near Mugelli by a reinforcement of three hundred horse, and eight hundred foot, all Pistoians, under Uberti, who was himself a Florentine exile. Nothing, however, could re-animate them after their late disappointment; and thus the enterprize rame to nothing.

Įи

In the mean while pope Benedict died, and the Florentine

The Florentines federacy

deputies, after complaining to the cardinals of the legate's treachery, returned to Florence. On examining into the state their con- of their affairs, and the strength of their enemies, they thought proper to renew and extend their confederacy with with their all the neighbouring states of the Guelph party, which comneighbours prehended those of Lucca, Volterra, Sienna, Prato, Gemmiani, Colle, and Civita Castellana. This alliance being formed, the confederates resolved to chuse a general to command the whole of the troops, that they might act with more effect, and they pitched upon prince Robert, eldest son to Charles king of Naples. The conditions of his command were, that he should have no direction in the civil government of the confederate states, but that he should have the command of their armies; that he should reside constantly in Tuscany for a whole year; that the confederates should maintain the cavalry he was to bring along with him, and contribute, in proportion to their abilities, towards a revenue for himself. In this contribution the Florentines, as the most powerful, had the greatest share, and the Lucquese the next to them. Early in the following spring, Robert arrived in . Tuscany, at the head of a small, but well disciplined, body of horse, and taking upon him the command of the allied army, he laid siege to Pistoia.

THE reader, in the course of this history, will perceive how aukward the Florentines, and indeed all the people of Italy were at that time, in the art of belieging towns; and that they feldom attempted a frege in which they succeeded. This was not fo much owing to the strength of the places, as to the unskilfulness of the assailants, who were destitute of engines. Pistoia had within it a strong garrison, and the place was well defended, so that the siege was converted intoa blockade, which lasted four months. In the mean while, Clement V. who had been chosen pope, sent two legates into Tuscany, to diffuade Robert and the confederates from continuing their hostilities against Pistoia. Robert immediately defisted, as did all the confederates, except the Florentines and Lucquese, who, in contempt of the papal authority, ob-Florence stinately continued the blockade. Upon this the states of and Lucca Lucca and Florence were, by the legates, laid under an interinterdicted. dict. Notwithstanding this, the siege, or rather blockade, of Pistoia continued ten months, till the besieged began to be pressed by famine and want of necessaries; the only engines the besiegers knew how to apply. In vain the Pistoians endeavoured to fend their women and useless mouths out of the city, for they were driven back by the besiegers; and the Pistoians

Filians were obliged at last to capitulate; but the only germs they could obtain were, that the exiles within the place might depart in safety, and that no punishment should be inflicted upon the inhabitants. This taking of Piftoia is Pilloia a memorable zera in the Florentine history, and happened in taken. the year 1306 d. The conquerors no fooner got possession of it than they dismantled all its fortifications, and divided its houses and territories amongst themselves. The confederate army next laid fiege to Acciani, a very strong place belonging to the family of the Ubaldi, where most of the exiles had taken refuge. They belieged this place for three months; but they could not have taken it, had not the defendants fallen at variance amongst themselves, and surrendered it for a sum of money. The place was dismantled, and razed to the ground, and the inhabitants removed to a neighbouring valley, where they built for themselves a town, afterwards called Scarpari.

This year was created in Florence a new magistrate, un- A new der the title of the executor of justice. Great part of the magistrate power of the gonfalonier was transferred to him; and that created in be might be the more difinterested, it was enacted, that the Florence. office should not be held by a native of Florence, or of Tufcary. The fame year the companies of Florence were reduced from twenty to nineteen. Cardinal Nicholas of Prato. the same who had been the pope's legate in Florence, was now in high favour with pope Clement, who owed his election to the popedom to him. This cardinal never had lost fight of his favourite scheme of restoring the Florentine exiles; and he persuaded the pope to send cardinal Neapoli, who was of the noble family of the Ursini, as his legate to Florence, to compose all the disquiets of Tuscany. The cardinal having passed the Alps, sent a messenger to Florence, signifying his approach, and ordering preparations to be made for his reception, and that of his retinue. This produced a confultation amongst the Florentine magistracy, who, says my author , having experienced that the residence of legates amongst them had always rather inflamed than allayed their civil diffentions, resolved to refuse him admittance into their The legate therefore was obliged to retire to Celena, where he put Florence under an interdict. But the Florentines The Florence knew now how to sport with the papal bolts; and the legate rentines marching to Arezzo, put himself at the head of a large body despise the of horse and soot, chiefly composed of the Florentine exiles, papal intending to force his entrance into Florence. Upon this the power.

LEONARDI ARETINI Hist. Flor. p. 83. * Ibid. p. 84.

Florentines

Florentines, calling their confederates to their affishance, laid fiege to the castle of Gargonza, where great numbers of the exiles were assembled. This gave the legate an opportunity of advancing towards Florence; but the Florentine army returning from the siege, he retired to Arezzo, and soon aster, finding all his endeavours unsuccessful, he returned to France.

THERE is somewhat singular in the state of Florence at this time. The inhabitants had, upon all occasions, distinguished themselves in desence of the holy see, and gloried in being its votaries, and yet the popes of late had never gained one point which they thought might tend to the prejudice of their freedom or interest. In sact, they professed themselves Guelphs, because it was the most convenient party for them to espouse, without having one grain of regard for the papal authority. Though the papal thunders now roared more surriously than ever above their heads, yet so greatly were they disregarded by the Florentines, that they multiplied tax on tax upon the ecclesiastics, to indemnify themselves for the expences they had been at in the late war.

A. D. 1307. Curfio Donati killed.

NEXT year, 1307, was free from foreign wars, but filled with domestic contentions. Cursio Donati still remained diffatisfied, and was the patron of all the malcontents. He had about him that kind of stubborn virtue which is ill suited to a popular government; for, instead of courting honours, he imagined that honours ought to court him. His magnanimity, however, and the ready refuge which diffress always found in him, but above all his profest opposition to the nobility, procured him vast popularity, which, at the same time, his enemies gave out he intended to employ to the subversion of public liberty. Their report was somewhat countenanced by his marrying the daughter of Fagiolani, a nobleman of great power and authority, which, they faid, were to be applied to make Cursio master of Florence. people believed the report from the appearances that favoured it, and Cursio was cited to appear before the magistracy. He was now the most unpopular man in Florence; but still he was backed by some friends, from the opinion they had of his personal virtues. Conscious of his innocence, and at the fame time of the power of his adversaries, he refused to appear before the magistrates; and in one day he was accused, cited, and condemned. Knowing the fate to which he was destined, he fortified his house, which the magistrates, seconded by all the power of the city, befieged and stormed, after a valiant resistance of some hours, and Cursio, in endeavouring to make his escape, was killed. After his death, both both the people and magistracy repented of their proceedings. No process was held against his estate or samily; and, too late, they restected that no accusation, except the hasty one which had procured his death, had ever been brought against him.

THE Arezzians, for some time, had been under the Gibe-Generosite In government; but having expelled the family of the Tar- of the Floleti, they renewed their ancient confederacy with the Floren-rentines. times about the beginning of the year 1308. About the same time the Florentines interposed to quell some seditions at Praise, which had been fomented by the Pistoians, who were exasperated at the Lucquese, for pressing the Florentines to the utter demolition of Pificia. The Florentines generously rejected this proposal, and even agreed that the Pisteians should have liberty to rebuild their fortifications, which they did in a very thort time, by the affiftance of their religious, their young, and their aged of both sexes. Mean while the Tarlati, by the affiftance of Fagiolani, again got footing in Arezzo, from whence they expelled their enemies, who were patronized by the Florentines. And thus fire and sword again raged in the territories of Arezzo.

THOUGH the Florentines, as we have seen, resolutely opposed all attempts made by the papal see against their independency, yet they were very ready to vindicate and affift the authority of his holiness, in all matters that were indifferent to They therefore this year sent a body of troops to the affiftance of the papal legate, who was at war with the Vemetians, over whom he gained a complete victory, by means of that reinforcement. Upon this his holiness off took his interdict from Florence, which now became his favourite city. That same year the Florentines were chosen arbiters by the inhabitants of Gemmiani and Volterra, who had been long at war on account of their limits, which were now fettled by the Florentines, to the fatisfaction of both parties. Towards The Flothe close of the year, the Florentines sent three hundred horse rentines and fix bundred foot to the affistance of their allies of Ci-relieve Ciwite Castellana, who were oppressed by the domineering fac- vita Castion at Arezzo. As those troops were to march through the tellana, territories of the Arezzians, their expedition might have proved fatal, had it not been for the madness of the Arezzians, who, understanding how despicable the Florentine force was, attacked them on their march to Cortona, but in so inegular and tumultuary a manner that the Florentines obtained a complete victory.

NEXT summer, the Florentines and their allies, being joined by the Arexzian exiles, marched against Arexzo, and be-

1309

and befiege fieged it. During the fiege, Henry of Luxemburgh, who had lately been chosen emperor, sent ambassadors to Florence, who demanded an audience of the magistracy. This being granted, the purpose of the ambassy was declared to be, that the Florentines should prepare to receive in their city Henry, who was about to march into Italy, at the head of a valt army, and that they should defish from the stege of Arezzo. According to Ricabaldi of Ferrara, who lived near those times , the Florentines and the Bolognese, and the other Guelphs of Italy, had secretly entered into a league not to They enter obey Henry. This confederacy feems to be confirmed by emperor,

into a con-Aretin b, who tells us that the Florentines, in answer to the ambassadors, expressed their surprize that a Roman emperor against the should carry his barbarians into Italy, and at the same time justified the war they had undertaken against Arezzo. Henry's ambassadors delivered the same message to the Arezzians, and received much the same answer. The campaign, as afaal, ended in depopulating the neighbouring country, and the Florentines returned to their own city.

By this time the emperor had advanced as far as the lake Leman at the head of his army, and that news led the Florentines into very ferious confultations. However despicable the strength of Florence was, when opposed to that of Henry, yet they behaved on this occasion with vast spirit; and after many debates, they came to the dangerous refolution of refuling Henry admittance into their city, and of joining with Robert king of Sicily, who foon after came to Florence, where he met with great honours, and flaid for almost a month. confirmed.

1311. wbo marches into Italy.

According to Aretin c, it was then the Guelph league, of the Halian states, was formed; but we rather think it was then The emperor was attended by Leopold duke of Austria, and Rodolphus of Bavaria, with Baldwin archbishop of Treves, the bishop of Liege, the counts of Savoy and Flanders, and other lords of the empired; fo that the Germans army was very formidable. As no emperor of Germany had ever been in Italy, fince the time of Frederick II. pope Clement V. though he had before invited him, now put himself at the head of the confederacy against him. The greatness of Henry's army and court, rendered his marches very flow, which was of some service to the Florentines. Notwithstanding the danger they were in, they this year fent an army to the affistance of the Arezzian Guelphs, who were hard pressed by their adverfaries, but relieved by the Florentines.

c Ibid. ^a Muratori, tom. ix. pag. 259. • Page 87. d Heiss's Hist. of the Empire, pag. 329. Florentine Furntine Gibelins, however, joined the emperor; and even Dante himself, in one of his epistles, bitterly reproaches the Furntines for their conducts, in resisting him; and many messages passed between them and the emperor, who continued most of the year about Milan, Cremona, and Broscia, and other places in that neighbourhood. The Flerentines: still continued obstinate; but many of the wifer and more moderate amongst them, proposed a kind of an act of amnessy, for re-admitting their exiled brethren, which at last passed; but by the intrigues of one Baldi, a mercenary lawyer, it was clogged with great numbers of exceptions, which asterwards proved of vast detriment to the state. Amongst those who were excepted was Dante the poet.

GREAT numbers, however, were reftored by this act of Progress. amnetly, and the confederacy now extended to Florence, Lucca, Sienna, Piftoia, Bologna, Citta di Caftello, and a great number of other smaller states, who all ranged themselves under the banners of Robert king of Sicily, and Bologna was appointed to be the place of rendezvous for all their forces, as being most convenient for preventing the emperor's march into Tuscany. The emperor spent the winter of the year 1211 at Genea, which lent him twenty long gallies, and in the following March he arrived at Pifa, in his way to Rame; but remained some days at Viterbo, that he might the better understand the state of Italy, which he found most miserably divided. His intention was to re-establish the imperial authority there, and he had made himself be crowned king of Lemberdy at Milax; but he could not prevail upon the pope and the cardinals to crown him in Rome. Having, however, a great faction in that city, he resolved to sorce his way into it, though he was opposed by John the prince of Morea, brother The Florentines, ever faithful to to Redert king of Sicily. their engagements, understanding how things went at Rome. fent their friends there a strong reinforcement; so that it was with the utmost difficulty that he forced his way into the city, and was tumultuously crowned by some cardinals in the church and cornof St. John Lateran on the first of August, 1312. This ir-nation of regular coronation would have been but of little fervice to the imperor the emperor, had he not been favoured by the intestine di- at Rome, visions which at this time prevailed all over Italy. He had made himself master of Milan and Cremona, the latter by force; and obliged Parma, Vicenza, and Piacenza, to acknowledge his authority, and pay him money. Padua paid him one hundred thousand crowns, and submitted to receive a governor from him; and Venice made him a present of a magnificent crown of gold, enriched with diamonds: and he appointed governors in all the cities that either voluntarily, or by force, submitted to him. Nicholas bishop of Brotonto 2, who attended Henry in this expedition, informs us, that the Florentines on this occasion fent one Ricardo Hugueti, to make up matters with the emperor, but that they deecived him. Aretin is filent as to that ambaffy; so that posfibly it was no other than a fecret negotiation between the emperor and the heads of the Gibelin party in Florence (A): Be that as it will, it is certain that the emperor was enraged beyond all measure with the king of Sicily and the Florenzines, to whom he imputed all the difficulties he encountered. His German army, by this time, was so greatly harraffed and weakened, that he was in no condition to march against Robert: he therefore resolved to vent his rage upon Florence, and advanced against that state by the way of Perugia; Cortona, and Areano, keeping the Appennines on his right. In Florence, his march he was joined by all the Florentine exiles, who had been excepted out of the late act of amnesty. The Florentines, mean while, were not wanting to themselves: they called in all their troops, which were in excellent order, and charged their generals to do all they could to oppose the emperor; but, if possible, to avoid coming to a battle. The emperor, however, made himself master of several places of their territories; and at last came to Ancifa, where the Florentine army was so strongly entrenched, that he could not have proceeded, had he not been directed in his march by the Florentine exiles, who knew the country. The bishop of Brotonto says, that the emperor's army was then in very bad plight; but that the emperor, having beaten part of the Florentines, would certainly have made himself master of Aneisa, had he attempted it. Aretin's account is pretty much the same b; and it appears upon the whole, that Henry's animosity against Florence hurried him into a wrong step, by his leaving Ancifa, and the main part of the Florentine army, at

Cronaca di dino Compagni apud MURATORI, tom. ix. pag.

wibo marches against

^{*} Iter Italicum Henrici Septimi. Imper. apud Munatoni, tom. ix. pag. 922. b ARETIN. pag. 90.

⁽⁴⁾ Notwithstanding this to the Florentine history at this feeming omission, the agree- time, is wonderful, when we ments amongst the Italian au- consider the factions that then thors, in all particulars relating tore Italy.

his back, and marching against Florence, which he immediately invested on the side of the Cafantine gate.

THE Florentines, on seeing the imperial army, imagined subich be that their troops had been totally defeated at Ancilia, and this befieges, belief threw them into a consternation that terminated in but They manned their walls, and renaired their fortifications; but Aretin does not comprehend why the emperor did not take the first advantage of the consternation of the Florentines, and affault the city, in which case he probably would have made himself master of the place . The bishop of Betronto, who, at this time, attended the emperor's person, accounts for this omission, by telling us, that the emperor then was in a desperate state of health; that he had not with him above three hundred horse; that his camp was unprovided of every thing, through the madness of the Germans, who had made a military defert wherever they came; and that they were obliged to buy at double price their provisions from the Cibelius, who attended the army, and who left him as foon as their turn was ferved. In fact, the Florentines, from despair, reflected with amorement on their own condition. They furnmened their confederates to their affistance, and the Lucque fe cent them three thousand foot, and the hundred horse, all well-appointed troops. In a few hours their own army arrived from Ancila, by a different route from what the emperor had taken, and they were now to fecure, that though the emperor was encamped within three hundred paces of their walls, they scarcely perceived that they were besieged. Henry, on the is forced to last day of November, raised the siege, but not without being raise the harrassed in his retreat by the Florentines. When he came stege. to Casciano, which he besieged, he received a strong reinforcement from Pifa of three thousand foot and five hundred horse, and one thousand Gensele cross-bows. The bishop of Botronto acknowledges, that the Germans committed great irregularities during this fiege, by burning a great many places, and taking others. Amongst the latter was the castle of &. Mary, where Contardi, of the family of Filache, then one of the noblest in Venice, was made prisoner. The Gilelin faction were earnest with the emperor to have taken off this nobleman's head, that he might thereby strike the greater terror into his enemies. The emperor, however, chose to difmifs him in fafety, which he accordingly did, on condition of his returning to Florence, and endeavouring to concliate the minds of his countrymen to the emperor. Contardi acquitted himself like a man of honour as to the conditions of his release; but without success. On his return to the emperor, he laid the principal blame of the stubbornness of the Florentines upon the bishop of Florence and his clergy, who were perpetually haranguing the people to stand by their liberties against the emperor. The emperor, while he lay before Casciano, was so little formidable to the Florenrentines, that they dimissed their auxiliaries, and harrassed him to such a degree, that he was obliged to raise the siege, and removed to Poggiobonza, formerly called Bonetium, where he rebuilt the fortifications that had been razed by Charles of Anjou. But though it was now in the middle of winter, his army was so harrassed by the Florentines, that he was obliged to keep the field till the beginning of January, 1213.

The Florentines apply to Robert king of Naples.

THE emperor's obstinacy, however, in continuing this war, gave the Florentines such apprehensions, that they refolved to apply to Robert king of Naples, Sicily being then under Frederick, for affistance, as they expected he would renew the war next spring with more fury than ever. They chose for their ambassadors Giacomo Bardi and Dardano Ac-They were instructed to repair to Sienna and Perugia, that they might excite those states to join in the common cause, and likewise to apply to the Lucquese and Bolognese. All of them ordered their deputies to join with those of Florence. Robert received the deputies with the utmost affection, and promised, if the affairs of his kingdom would fuffer him, to put himself at the head of the Tuscan consederacy in person; and in the mean time, he sent his brother Peter to their affistance with a body of cavalry. This gave great spirits to the Florentines; but they were quickly damped by a demand made upon them from Robert of three months pay for his horsemen. This demand was the more unseasonable, as the state, of late, had been put to so great expence. that the public treasury was exhausted; nor would their other allies contribute to any share of the expence. In vain they applied to Robert for a mitigation of his demand; and part of the money being paid, they expected him to fulfil his promise. Robert knew the dread the Florentines were under of subjection to the emperor, and trifled with them so long, that they were forced to come to a resolution of offering to him the fovereignty of their city and dominions for five years. This was done by the prefidents, who were vested with authority from the people for that purpose; but unon

They transfer the gowernment of their city to him for five

wari.

b I:er Italicum, pag. 929. ARETIN. pag. 90.

the following express conditions, viz. "That the king himself. in person, or one of his sons or brothers, should reside in Flomu; that no exile should be restored; that the people should be governed by their own laws; and that the power of the presidents should continue." Deputies were then appointed by the state, who repaired to Naples, and made a tender to Robert of his new sovereignty. Robert began his government with an act of justice highly approved of by the Florentines; for the presidents, who had been the main instruments of conferring the government upon him, prefurning upon the great services they had done him, solicited him for certain immunities to themselves and their families, and other privileges, which were incompatible with the liberties of the people; Robert, after ratifying the instrument by which he received the government, rejected this application with the utmost distain and dislike.

WHILE the emperor continued at Poggiobenza, he entered The eminto a league with Frederick king of Sicily against Robert. peror Their intention was to invade the kingdom of Naples; and leagues Frederick for that purpose surnished the emperor with a large with the sum of money. This supply enabled the emperor to take king of into his pay seventy Genoese gallies, to hire more troops in Sicily Germany, and to make other preparations, which might against have proved fatal both to Florence and Robert, had not the bim. emperor himself died near Sienna, in the midst of his expe- The emdition against Florence and its consederates, in August, 113. peror dies. Authors of no mean rank ' tell us he was poisoned. He certainly was a violent but impolitic prince. Before his death His chahe had arrogated to himself the sovereignty of all Italy, and ratter. had fummoned all the princes and states of it not only to do him homage, but to pay him tribute. The Florentines and their allies had the courage to oppose him; for which, reason he denounced vengeance against them, and published edicts, giving them up to the sword, by putting both them and Robert king of Naples to the ban of the empire. This is faid to have been the fentence of his own death, by giving the Florentines the hint to poison him, which a Dominican, bired by them, did, in administering to him the sacrament. Whatever may be in this (for the fact is not sufficiently (B)

C VOLTAIRE, HEISS, &c.

Emporary author of great credit, published by Muratori, vol. x. of his Rerum Italicarum Scrip-

(B) Ferretus Vincentinus, a co- tores, has given us a very minute account of this prince's death; but leaves no room for thinking that it happened by poilon.

authenticated) it is certain his death happened very critically for the Florentines and their allies, as well as for the king of Naples, because it absolutely destroyed the strong confederacy that had been formed against them. The Genoese fleet was dismissed, and the imperial army returned to Germamy; while Frederick, who was then besieging Reggio, was obliged to return with his army to Sicily. The face of affairs all over Italy was now changed. The Florentines and their allies had been highly exasperated against the Pisans, for the affistance they had given to Henry, and determined to take a severe vengeance. The Pisans, upon this, chose for their governor Uguicio Fagiolani, in hopes of being able, by his means, to break or weaken the confederacy against them. Fagiolani immediately took into his pay eight hundred German horie, part of the emperor's army, and made great preparations against the Lucquese, who, upon that occasion, imitated the example of the Florentines, by putting themselves under the protection of the king of Naples. The elegant historians of Florence observes d, that this objection rendered them less alert than they had been before in the field, because they trusted too much to Robert's protection. The Florentines. however, punctually performed all their engagements with the Lucquese, and Fagiolani for some time thought proper to shut himself up in Pila. But no fooner did the confederates retire, than he attacked the Lucquese territories with so much fury, that he forced them to a scandalous peace, by which they delivered up several of their forts to the Pilans, and were obliged to re-admit into their city all their Gibelin exiles. The latter demanded to be reinstated in their effects; but this meeting with opposition, a civil war broke out in the city. The Florentines, on this occasion, gave a noble proof of their good faith: they had remonstrated, in the strongest terms, against the pusillanimity of the Lucquese in concluding the late peace; but still they supported their friends in Lucca. The Gibelin saction there, on the other hand, applied to Fagiclani, who came to their assistance with his German house, plundered the houses of both parties in Lucca, and drove all the Lucquese Guelphs out of that city.

Good faith of the Florentines.

A. D.

1314.

So fudden a revolution of government could take place only in an Italian state, balanced, as that of Lucca was, be-poison. He tells us, indeed, till after he was given over by that a Dominican gave him the his physicians. facrament; but this was not

LEONARD. ARETIN.

tween two powerful parties. The Lucquese exiles retired to some estates they had upon the Lower Arno, where they im- Lucqueso ploted the protection of the Florentines, which they received exiles sucin an eminent degree. They not only sent them succours, coursed by by which they were enabled to maintain their forts, but ap- the Floplied by an ambally to the king of Naples for affiltance. tines. Robert, to keep up his credit with the Tuscan states, whom he now confidered as his subjects, immediately ordered his brother Peter to march at the head of a body of horse to Florence. Peter's first care, after arriving there, was to make up matters with the Arezzians, whose government continued yet to be Gibelin, lest they should join with Fagiolani, and the Gibelins of Lucca and Pi/a. This great point being effected, the Fibrentines applied themselves entirely to the war against Pisa; while Fagiolani as briskly pushed that against the exiled Lucquese, the Pistoians, the people of Miniato, the Volterrans, and other states consederated with Florence, that were open to his incursions. At last he formed the siege of Cating. In the mean while Philip, prince of Tarentum, another brother of Robert king of Naples, came to Florence, and gave such life to the Florentines, that they put him at the head of all the troops they could muster up, and he marched to raise the siege of Catino. Fagiolani, on his side, made fuitable preparations to meet him; but, as he was interior in strength, he remained on the desensive, though without raising the siege. But Fagiolani found himself under 2 necessity of returning to Lucca, where his presence was neceffary to prevent a new revolution. This, however, he could not do without coming to a battle. Amongst the confederates of Florence were the Siennese and Collenese (C), whom Fagiolani attacked with such fury, that he drove them upon the main body of the Florentines. The latter, however, bravely made head against their enemies; but Fagiolani's. German horse breaking in, they were put to a total rout, and two thousand of them were cut in pieces, besides great numbers who were drowned. Philip, who commanded the army, was that day fick, so that the command devolved upon his younger brother Peter, who, together with Philip's eldest fon Charles, was killed in the battle. This victory was not

ARETIN, pag. 95. JANOTTI MANETTI Historia apud Muratorium, vol. xix. pag. 1030.

⁽C) The inhabitants of Colle, it scarcely deserves that name, a town of Tuscany, so small that though it is the seat of a bishop.

bloodless on the fide of Fagiolani. The Florentines killed his eldest son, and cut in pieces his first line of soot.

THE Florentines shewed great dissatisfaction at the conduct of their commanders that fatal day, and it was increased when they saw Catino surrendered to the conqueror, and that the king of Naples made no motion for affifting them. At last they began to talk of chusing another protector, when Novello, one of Robert's generals came, but with scarce any attendance, to put himself at the head of their army. disappointment rendered the Florentines still more outrageous. Two factions, the Royalists and the Anti-royalists, sprung up in the city, who often came to blows with each other: and there must have been an end of the Florentine liberty, had not the Pisans, in attempting to throw of Fagiolani's yoke, given his army such a diversion that the Florentines received a breathing-time.

The Pisans rebel against

IT was at this period that the famous Castruccio Castruccani appeared. His personal history will come more properly unthat of Lucca. It is sufficient here to say, that he was at this Fagiolani time a young man of wonderful endowments, both of body and mind, and was one of the Lucquese, who, upon the late revolution, had been re-admitted into that city; where falling under Fagiolani's displeasure, he was imprisoned, when he was at the height of his reputation, after doing Fagiolani the most important services. Fagiolani made no secret that he intended to put him to death, as he had done many other noble Pisans and Lucquese; but the latter took arms in his favour, and freed him from his imprisonment. Fagiolani hearing of this, marched out of Pisa, intending to reduce the contumacious Lucquese; but he was no sooner gone than the Pisans shut their gates against his return, while the Lucquese expelled him their city; and thus in one day he lost two principalities, and was obliged to fly with his fon to Luna, now Arici. Both the Pisans and Lucquese after this put themselves under the protection of the king of Naples, to the great discontent of the Florentines, who were in hopes of being revenged upon the Pisans for their defeat at Catino: being afraid, however, of injuring the common cause by difunion, they at last ratified what the king had done.

New regu-

This year is remarkable for a new regulation made in Florence, by which every horseman, who went to war, was to have his helmet, breast-plate, gauntlets, cuisses, and boots all of iron; a precaution which was taken on account of the disadvantages their cavalry had suffered from their light armour at the battle of Catino. Guido, a Tuscan count, whose estate lay in the neighbourhood of Florence, was then gover-per of the city under Robert, who grew daily more and more empopular there; not so much from any real grounds of dissatisfaction the people had, but because the seeds of enmity fill subfifting among the noble families, if one favoured the king, it was cause sufficient for the other to oppose him. Guide was perfectly well acquainted with the interests and dispositions of the Florentines, and acted with such incomparable wisdom and moderation, that he made up above fifty capital quarrels subsisting amongst noble families, and thereby all of them were reconciled to the king; so that he reduced Plerence to fuch a state of tranquility and unanimity that it scarce had ever known before. This period is further remarkable for the good faith with which the Florentines continued to affift their allies, by supporting the Guelphs of Cremona and Parma against their enemies.

ROBERT king of Naples was at this time at Genoa, where A. D. a faction of the citizens put him in possession of that city. 1316. Meeting, however, with a strong opposition, he applied to The Flothe Florentines, who were then at peace both at home and rentines abroad, and their allies, for affistance, which was accordingly affift the fent him, and did him great service. The empire at this king of time was vacant, and had continued so ever since the death Naples. of the emperor Henry of Luxemburg in Italy. Pope Clement V. had condemned the memory of that emperor, and had reversed his sentence against Robert king of Naples. Not content with that, he pretended that Robert was his vallal, and that the holy fee had a right to govern the empire during its vacancy; he therefore named Robert to be the imperial, or rather the papal vicar all over the imperial fiefs and possesfions in Italy, and it was under that pretext he had got footin Genoa. The expelled Genoese, however, being supported by France, Robert could not have maintained his footing in that city, without the affishance of the Florentines. Upon the death of Clement V. John XXII. succeeded to the see of Rome. Although his father was only a shoe-maker, he pretended to the same right his predecessors had done of depofing kings, and disposing of empires; but the Gibelin interest was at this time very strong in Italy. The Florentines had weakened themselves by the great supplies they had sent to Genza and France against Robert's enemies. The bishop of Arezzo had again in a manner got possession of that city; and Castruccio of Lucca, who was a soldier of fortune, having been practised upon by the Gibelins, brought the Lucquese, whom he entirely governed, to declare against the Florentines. Thus Florence had a more formidable enemy than ever to encounter, no general in Italy being then thought comparable. F 4 parable to Castruccio, either for interest or reputation. All at once he invaded and laid waste the territories of Florence. and took many fortified places, proceeding as far as Empeli. The Florentines, upon this, were obliged to recal one thousand horse, who were serving the king of Naples in his Genoese wars. Castruccio, glad of this opportunity to shew his power, immediately marched towards Genoa, but was obliged to return by an irruption which the Florentines made into the Lucquese territories. His ambition was, if possible, to fight the Florentines; but the latter, conscious of his superiority, kept upon the defensive all that year, but not without a great los of reputation as well as territory.

Their Castrucçio,

NEXT year the Florentines made a league with Spinetta, a wars with Lucquese nobleman of great property, whom Castruccio had injured; and raising two armies, they invaded the Lucquese territories from different quarters. With one army they laid flege to Fighin; and with the other marched directly against Lucca, retaking a great many places they had before loft. Castruccio lost no time in opposing this double invafion, and marched with wonderful expedition to the relief of Fighini. The Florentines, on his approach, abandoned the fiege, and made a more halty retreat than was confistent with their honour. Castruccio, however, could not bring them to any decifive action, and with great difficulty, and some loss, they returned to Florence, Upon which Castruccie recovered all the places he had lost, and took several others.

 THE affairs of the Florentines were at this time in a low state, chiefly through the loss of reputation, and their having no man of great consequence to head them. They had suffered. greatly by the succours they had sent to the king of Naples, and their other allies; and they were so involved in war and difficulties in the year 1321, that they were obliged to create twelve affistant presidents for the management of affairs: they likewise that year added some new fortifications to their city.

THE ancient league between (D) the Florentines and the Pistoians still subsisted, and the former sent Julio, one of f ARETINI, pag. 98.

(D) The following particulars of the league between the Pistoians and Castruccio, are taken from the Pistoian chronicle of Janottius, or Jannectius Mapetti, a Florentine. published by Muratori, tom. xix. pag 987.

This Manettius is an unexceptionable author, not only as he was a Florentine of great rank and confideration, but governor of Pistoia. Aretin is very lame in this period of his history.

their best officers with a body of horse to the assistance of the latter, Castruccio having a strong party in their city, and an eve upon their government. At the same time Pino, a Floremine knight, was governor for the king of Naples in Pistoia. All that Julio could do, was to prevent Castruccio from making himself master of Pistoia; but he could not hinder him from actually laying the Pistoian territories under such heavy contributions, that the inhabitants wished for nothing so much as a peace, and some citizens of great eminence managed matters fo. that they brought about a conference between The Pic. Castruccio and Pino for that purpose; but they disagreed upon tojans the terms 8. This treaty gave so great unealiness to the Flo- treat with rentines that they sent for Pino to Florence; and in the mean Castructime the Pistoians of themselves chose a new governor, one cio, and Fume, a partizan of Castruccio. Ormanni, prior of the mo Submit to nastery of Pescia, was of the same saction, and extremely him. active in getting all the enemies to Castruccio removed out of the government. Ormanni's influence was so great in the flate, that he got the common people publicly to declare for a treaty with Castruccio. The Florentine government, understanding this, sent a formal ambassy, consisting of fix noblemen, and as many principal citizens, to dissuade the Pistoians from making, at least, a separate treaty. Ormanni hearing of this deputation, wrote to all the inhabitants of the Pistoian territories, desiring them to repair instantly to that city, if they were for peace with Castruccio. In the mean while, the Florentine ambassadors were received with the utmost politeness by Ormanni, and the heads of his faction; but by his management, the gates of the city and the palace were fuddenly seized by the people, and all the magistrates, whom they suspected to be averse to peace, were displaced. Ormanni pretended to the Florentine deputies, that this had been done without his knowledge, and against his intention; but at the same time he privately invited Castruccio to advance towards Pissoia, to give weight to the revolution.

It does not appear, from Manetti's relation, that Ormanni Revoluhitherto was more fincere with Castruccio than he had been tions in with the Florentine deputies; who, upon the news of Castruc-Luccatio's approach, hastily left Pistoia, and with some difficulty saved two noblemen, whom Ormanni designed to have put to death. After this, he took upon himself the exercise of the government, drove out of the city all who opposed him, and less the people to be plundered and oppressed by his rapacious kinsmen. He still, however, endeavoured to keep sair with Castruccio; but the latter, perceiving that Ormanni was only amusing him, made himself master of the greatest part of the Pistoian territory. This, together with Ormanni's own infolence, rendered him extremely unpopular; and Philip, his nephew, a man of much greater address and moderation, stript him of his power; but behaved so as to keep well both with Castruccio and the Florentines; though it was not long before he was obliged to give up the government of Pistoia intirely to Castruccio.

WHILE this revolution was bringing about in Pistoia, the Florentines sent an army to the relief of their allies of Sienna. while the turbulent bishop of Arezzo besieged and took Fronzoli, and persecuted with fire and sword all the allies of Florence in the territories of Arezzo, who sent to Florence for affistance. The bishop was then besieging Velona; and though the Florentines might well have excused themselves, on account of the multiplicity of the wars they were engaged in, from undertaking a new one, yet they immediately ordered a powerful affistance to their confederates. But the bishop by this time had taken and razed to the ground Velona; upon which the Florentine auxiliaries returned home, as the bishop did to Arezzo. The difficulties in which the Florentines were now involved, seem rather to increase than damp their spirits. They incessantly put their allies, who were chiefly composed of exiled Guelphs, in mind of Castruccio's power, and the danger the liberties of Tuscany were in from him; and this they did with such success, that they once more assembled a powerful army in Florence. This checked Castruccio's progress for some time; and the Florentines even entered into a treaty with the Genoese, whom they assisted with a body of landforces, upon condition that the Genoese should assist them with a fleet against the Lucquese, to give a diversion to Castruccio. While preparations were making for this expedition by land, an officer of approved fidelity, who had the command of three hundred horse, deserted with his men to Castruccio. The Florentines thought that this had happened through the corruption of the officer; and each dreading another, the expedition came to nothing. This gave an opportunity to Castruccio to make a fresh irruption into the Florentine territories, as far as St. Miniato; and then he returned triumphantly to Lucca, boatting that he had inflicted upon his enemies those calamities they had intended against him. In the mean while the bishop of Arezzo fell upon Fagiolani's estates, which lay at the foot of the Appennines; and after taking several of his castles, he besieged Rondino. This small city and territory had been always faithful to their confederacy with Florence, and the inhabitants immediately imploted its protection. The Farmtines, with forrowful hearts, found the danger they were mompassed with was such, that they could send no relief to their brave allies, who, after a resistance of some months, were obliged to give up their town to the bishop. In the mean while Castruccio had advanced as far as Prato, which hes almost half way between Florence and Pistoia, and but a kw miles from both. This spread such an alarm through Florence, that the people, without waiting for orders, ran to ams, marched out of the city, and, to the number of twenty thousand, faced Castruccio. The latter was startled at such superior numbers to his own; but not caring to attack an ennged multitude, though he made dispositions for fighting, he withdrew in the night-time from Piftoia; so that next morning the Florentines beheld no enemy. Manetti informs us h. though Aretin is filent on the matter, that Raimond Cardoni, who had been one of the pope's generals in France, was the Florentine commander in this expedition. It is certain, that the morning after Castruccio's retreat, the Florentines were dreadfully mortified in perceiving they had no enemy to fight. The common people, and all who had ferved as volunteers in the expedition, were for pursuing the enemy; but the nobility opposed them. This begat such differences in the army, that it was resolved to refer the matter to the council of preidents at Florence; but debates running as high amongst them as they had done in the army, the common people, who had been left behind, being joined by the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns and country, who all of them, on this occasion, repaired to Florence, forced their magistrates to continue the expedition, and to attempt the reduction of Lucca itself. This tumultuous resolution is as tumultuously expressed by the Florentine historians. It is certain, that an incredible number of people, in hopes of bringing Castruccio and his army in chains to Florence, marched to join their army near Prato. But when they came upon the spot, the whole formed an unwieldy disorderly concourse; and after a few altercations with the nobility, the main body returned to Florence, where new difficulties started on the following occasion.

An officer revolts from the Florentines.

WHILE the Florentines were trembling at the approach of Castruccio to Prato, they passed a decree, by which the Florentine exiles, who were very numerous, and all of them men of service, were promised re-admission into the city, if they would appear in arms, and join their countrymen against Costruccio. This brought a great body of exiles to the Florentine camp; where the nature of the disputes between the nobles and the people who returned to Florence, convinced them, that they would have some difficulty in being reinstated in the immunities that had been promised them. Being better mounted than the rest of the Florentine army, which was now on its march back to Florence, they thought to have got the start, and to have entered the city before them; but the prevailing party within the walls shut the gates against them: they therefore were obliged to encamp without the gates i. Next day the main army re-entered the city, and the exiles marched to Prate, from whence they fent eight deputies to treat with the magistracy and people of Florence.

MANETTI apud MURAT. p. 1035.

Divisions. in Florence.

THOSE deputies found the city greatly divided. The readmission of the Florentine exiles had been carried through by the presidents, who insisted upon the performance of the public faith; and they were joined by the nobility, who, being now cured of their attachment to the pope, fought to strengthen their interest by the re-admission of the exiles. The people, on the other hand, opposed that re-admission, not only from a spirit of pertinaciousness, but on account of the behaviour of the nobility in the late expedition. party of the nobles and magistracy, however, prevailed so far, that the deputies of the exiles had a public hearing. In this audience they strongly urged the decree of the presidents in favour of their re-admission. Upon their withdrawing, one of the shrewdest among the popular advocates insisted, that the presidents, who were but trustees of the public, were not authorized, by the constitution of their government, to make any fuch decree without the confent of the people, whose fense ought to be consulted upon the occasion. Great objections were likewise raised against the exiles for their leaving their camp, and attempting to force their way into the city. It appears from Aretin k, as if, in such cases of debate, the Florentines had proceeded to ballot, which, in this question, went greatly against the exiles; upon which the affembly was dismissed, and the exiles came to a resolution of forcing their way into the city. This could not be done without confulting their friends within the walls; and while that was in agitation, the citizens, more than suspecting the matter, doubled their guards, and manned their walls; so that when the

The exiles exiles, to the number of fifteen thousand, came to execute disappoint- their design, they perceived it had been discovered, and found themselves under a necessity of abandoning it.

ARETINI, p. 100.

k Ibid. p. 102:

THEIR appearance before the gates was evidence sufficient whe people that they had accomplices in the city; but the equilar proceedings on this occasion, though without precetest, were, beyond all example, wife and moderate. Having politive proof against any one, and yet convinced that some f them were guilty, they met in a body, and every one mining down the name of the person he suspected, all the mes were thrown into a kind of balloting box; and upon tramination it was found, that, by the plurality of the affemby's tickets, their suspicions were fixed on three persons, merige or Americo Donati, Teggia Frescobaldi, and Lotteringo Gerardini. Those noblemen being cited, appeared before the magistracy, where they justified the suspicion of the people, by owning that they knew of the conspiracy of the exiles, but that they had not encouraged it. This being what is called, by the law of England, milprisson of treason, each had a moderace fine (A) imposed upon him, and were subject to a slight hort banishment. This fentence being pronounced, the people furnished themselves with what they called penons, from whence the English have the same word, which were diminuis of their great flags of arms, and to which they could sort on occasions, either when they could not join their eat flandards, or when their magistrates prohibited their ting displayed.

At this time, the constitution of Florence received a new New rea important alteration. The election of magistrates gulations always, till then, been carried by a majority; but this in Floproving the source of great heats in the state, it was agreed rence.

hat the electors, who confifted of the prefident and the membut of the colleges, should write upon tickets, and inclose in I thell, the names of fuch citizens as they conceived to be Poper for magistrates; and that, when the day of election fo many of those names should be casually taken out, haking the chest or coffer, according to the number to thosen; and those names that were first drawn were to be magistrates elect. Their persons, however, were subject that no man could be disqualifications; which were, that no man could be significate who had ferved in the fame post within three or who had a brother or near relation in the magistracy. Their authority was to continue three years and a half (B).

(A) Aretin's words are, Duomillibus æris finguli eorum This fum, according the best of my information, Piece.

(B) Though this method of chusing by lots continued aslong as Florence could be called a republic; yet Aretin, p. 103, not exceed so !. Sterling thinks that its evil over-ballanced its good confequences.

Wille

WHILE Florence was thus providing for the security of her liberty, the was in danger of losing her territory, which. Costruccio was laying waste on the one hand; while the bishop of Arezzo, on the other, took Tifernum, or Citta di Castelle. The neighbourhood and power of the Arezzian prelate alarmed some of the Tuscan states so greatly, Peruggia particularly, that they renewed their league with Florence for three years, and resolved to attempt the recovery of Citta di Castelle. Castruccio, who had excellent intelligence of the motions of his enemies, was at this time lying near Fucetti, a town of great importance on the frontiers of Lucca, but in possession of the Florentines. Being unable to take it by force, he had recourse to money, and corrupted part of its garrison with a large sum; so that he found admittance, in a dark and stormy night, with one hundred and fifty horse and five hundred foot. corrupted part of the garrison, and the citizens, finding they were betrayed, ran to arms, and drove Castruccio, after a most bloody encounter, to the upper part of the town; where he was obliged to barricade himself and his troops, in hopes of his being joined next day by the main body of his army. the neighbouring garrisons in the interest of Florence, suspecting what had happened, from the fires they faw lighted up in the night-time within the place, fent fuch reinforcements next morning to the garrison, that Castruccio could no longer maintain his ground; and receiving a wound in his face, he escaped with great difficulty, and with the loss of almost his whole party. This year there was, by tacit consent, a kind of a cessation of arms between the Florentines and the Arezzians; but the former joined their troops with the Siennese, the Bolognese, and their other confederates, in the expedition against Citta di Castello. By this time Castruccio had become intirely mafter of Pistoia, where he gave his daughter in marriage to Philip, who some time before had for that purpose poisoned his former wife.

Intestine divisions there. This danger from abroad seemed rather to increase than abate the intestine divisions of Florence. The people attributed all their missortunes to the mismanagement or corruption of their magistrates, whom they displaced at the next general election; and, amongst others, one Nardi Bordo, or Berdo, whom they resolved to impeach before Robert's governor for treason. The presidents, either savouring the accused, or conscious of his innocence, sent him abroad in a public character; and, when the day of trial came, his brother, attended by the officers of the presidents, pleaded his employment as an excuse for his absence. The president, who was Bordo's enemy, over-ruled this plea; and from words they

they proceeded to blows. The president, savoured by the people, remained master of the sield; and not only prosounced sentence against Bordo, but banished his brother out of the city.

THE war all this while was going on brickly between the Progress of Florentines and their confederates, who had still Raimond at the war their head, and Castruccio, who remained on the defensive, between But up in Pistoia. Raimond, to draw him to a battle, made Castrucdispositions as if he was about to besiege Ticiani, and sent out cio and foraging parties to the very gates of Pistoia. Those movements amused Castruccio, so that Raimond made himself mas-rentines, ter of Capiano and Falconi. This great success of the allies gave the Florentines such spirits, that they reinforced their army under Raimond, so as that the whole amounted to twenty thousand foot, besides horse. They then besieged Topalci, a very strong place, with a garrison within it of five hundred men, but very unwholfomely fituated on the fide of a lake. The besieged, expecting every day to be relieved by Costruccio, made an obstinate defence; but the diseases which the allies contracted, during the fiege, ruined their army. Castruccio advanced to the relief of the place, and did all that an able general, at the head of an army inferior to that of his enemies, could do to raise the siege (D); but being defeated in several encounters, the town was yielded to the allies. A great division now succeeded amongst them, concerning their subsequent operations: some were for returning to Flarence, on account of the great mortality that had happened in their army, and the diminution of their troops by leave of absence, and other accidents. The majority, however, carried it for an expedition against Lucca itself. ground, over which the army was to march, was very woody and uneven, an advanced party of one hundred horse were detached before to reconnoitre. They were attacked by the who are like number from Castruccio's army, which remained still in deseated. the neighbourhood; and both parties being supported from their main bodies, a general engagement followed, in which the bravest on both sides were killed, and Castruccio himself was wounded; but the day was decided in his favour, though

(C) The reader is to observe, that the face of the country of Infany is now so greatly altered, that several places mentioned here have now hardly any enstead. Nor are the Italian uniters themselves agreed about the fituation of them. I have therefore thought proper, where there is any doubt concerning them, to keep as near as I can to the names given them by Arctin.

Raimend made an orderly retreat, and even laid some claim to the victory.

RAIMOND, however, could not re-inspire the Florentines with courage sufficient to keep the field, and their dejection after the battle corresponded to their presumption before it. Castruccio, on the other hand, sensible of the important victory he had obtained, made dispositions for carrying on the war against the Florentines with greater vigour than ever. For this purpose he applied to Galeazzo, viscount of Milan. He sent to his affistance his son Azo, a young prince of great fire and courage, with eight hundred horse, who immediately set out for Lucca. While they were upon their march, Castruccio found means to spread so many suspicious reports amongst the Florentines, that their general did not find it fafe for him to march to intercept the Milanefe. But no fooner was it known that the latter were in the neighbourhood of Lucca, than the Florentine army fell back to Topalci, and from thence to Fucetti. They were pursued by Castruccio and the Milanese, who fell in with their rear, and drove the Florentines into such a situation, that they had no safety but by fighting. A desperate battle ensued, in which their lieutenant-general under Raimond, being (as it is faid) corrupted by Castruccio, gave way; and the Milanese horse making themselves masters of a bridge by which the Florentines were to retreat, a terrible flaughter followed, in which the Florentines were cut in pieces, and their general with his fon were taken prisoners by Castruccio, who likewise made himself master of all their camp and baggage. Castruccio improved this victory by conquering the Florentine territory, and laying it waste to the very gates of Florence, which he insulted for fome days with all the indignities he could devise. He then returned by the way of Prato to Lucca, where he paid his Milanese auxiliaries out of the immense booty he made in the This punctuality was so pleasing to Azo, that, in revenge, as he faid, for the Florentines having always taken part against the viscounts of Milan, he led his horse once more against the Florentines; but not being able to bring them to a battle, he braved the inhabitants within their walls, returned to Lucca, and from thence home.

FLORENCE was at this time in a most deplorable situation. Castruccio renewed his ravages, and burnt down all that his sury had spared before. This obliged the country people, with their families, to sly to Florence, which created first a samine, and then a postilence. There must now have been an end of that republic, had it not been for the moderation of the bishop of Arezzo, who began to grow jealous of

1

Calruccio's greatness. The latter again and again solicited that prelate, and the Arezzians, to revenge the former injunes and losses they had suffered from the Florentines, and to undertake the fiege of that city on one fide, while he carried it on on the other. The prelate firmly rejected this peopobl; upon which Custruccio carried his devastations into the Flarentine territories lying towards the vale of Mugelli, at the foot of the Appennines. The reader who knows the fertility and riches of the Florentine territory, will not be surprised at Coffraccio still finding fresh objects of rapine and devastation. He met with no opposition in the field; but upon his return towards Segni, which lay within fight of Florence, the Florentines fent out one thousand foot and two hundred horse. to dispute an advantageous pass by which he must march. Had this order been expeditionally executed, Castruccio, in all probability, must have been defeated, or, at least, forced to refign the effects and cartle he had taken; but he had got clear of the pass before the Florentines came up, and arrived fafe at Segni; where he was so well pleased with his succelles, that he ordered money to be struck in commemoration

THE Florentines bore their misfortune with incredible con- Conflance fancy: they named two new officers to take care of the of the Floforifications of the city, which were repaired and improved, rentines, and took precautions for preventing Castruccio's return to the vale of Mugelli. In the mean while the pope, being exafperated with the bishop of Arezzo, for having taken Citta di Castelle, and holding it against his express injunctions and commands, struck off Cortona from the see of Arezzo, and named one Rainer, of the family of Uberti, for its first bishop. Guide, bishop of Arezzo, looking upon the erection of this new bishopric to be a robbery committed upon himself, immediately laid siege to Laterina, while the Arezzians demo-Med the houses, and plundered the estates of the Uberti sa-Billy. Laterina was taken and razed to the ground by the pelate, who after this took Sabinum, which he likewise lerelled.

Those successes of the bishop of Arezzo rendered Castrueai jealous in his turn. He offered to treat with the Florentines for peace, and for that purpose employed the chief Florentine prisoners who were in his hands. The Fiorentines were so exasperated by the losses they had sustained, that they not only declined all advances towards a peace, but deprived the friends and relations of the captives of all places of power and trust they had in the government, lest they should savour the negotiations. At the same time they raised fresh troops, and, though their capital enemy was in a manner at their gates, they sent two hundred horse to the assistance of their Bolognese allies. Upon this Castruccio laid siege to Murli, a town in the neighbourhood of Prato. This place was bravely defended by Adimar and Pattio against the utmost efforts of Castruccio, who was at last obliged to turn the siege into a kind of blockade: but in the mean time he renewed his incursions to the gates of Florence, from which his troops were driven with great loss by the Florentines. He then resumed the siege of Murli, which continued to make a gallant desence; but the garrison having no prospect of relief, was at last obliged to deliver up the place, after an honourable capitulation.

¹ Aretin. pag. 90.

who refign their city to the prince of Tarentum.

During those distresses, the Florentines applied for protection once more to the court of Naples, and refigned the government of their city, for ten years, into the hands of Charles prince of Tarentum, fon to that king, who made great preparations for taking pollession of his new government. A Frenchman, whose name was Peter, then commanded the Florentine army; and a great number of his countrymen ferving in Castruccio's troops, he found means to enter into a conspiracy with them for delivering the important fortress of Segni into his hands. This conspiracy was discovered, and the heads of it were put to death; but this discovery tended only to render Castruccio's troops jealous of one another, fo that he came to a resolution of razing the place. Peter, who knew nothing of the discovery, advanced with a body of troops against Segni, where he found the gates shut against him; while Castruccio himself renewed his ravages in the Florentine territories. Soon after this Caftruccio demolished Segni, and removed his head-quarters to Carmini, where he over reached the Frenchman in his own arts, by means of certain emissaries, who pretended they would betray Carmini into his hands. Peter marched with a body of troops to take possession, as he thought, of that place. In his march he fell into a strong ambuscade, which had been formed by Castruccio. His troops were partly put to the fword, and partly, with himself, taken prisoners, and put to death in cold blood by Castruccio, on pretence that Peter, by his intrigues, had transgressed the laws of war. This disaster served to redouble the instances of the Florentines at the court of Naples, for hastening the march of Charles to their affishance. They encreased the revenue they were

were to pay him, and engaged to defray the expence of fix thousand additional troops while the war lasted.

ABOUT this time cardinal Ursini arrived at Florence, as legate from the pope, and waited some time for the arrival of Charles, to consult upon the means of restoring the tranquility of Tuscany. Charles, in his approach to Florence, spent some time at Sienna, to secure his interest in that city; and a last he entered Florence in vast pomp, and with such a retime as alarmed many of the Florentines, who fignified their apprehensions that their public liberty was about to fall a sacrifice to Charles and the legate.

ì

)

i

€

GALEAZZO, the artful viscount of Milan, was well apprized of their apprehensions; and being an enemy at once to the pope and the king of Naples, he prevailed with the Gibelin faction, both in Florence and all over Italy, to invite the emperor Lewis V. of Bavaria, to come in person to their affiftance. Fohn XXII. continued still to sit in the papal chair, and had again and again excommunicated Lewis. The latter, however, receiving great encouragement in Germany, well as in Italy, to proceed in the expedition, passed the Alps, and came to Trent, with his empress. He there mmoned a general affembly of all the Italian Gibelins; and his prospect of success was so fair, that in the beginning of sext year he marched to Milan, where he was crowned king of Lombardy, by the hands of the turbulent bishop of Arezzo: but Lewis, being poor, he fleeced the Italian states so immoderately, that they foon became tired of his government. Castruccio was by him honoured with the title of his vicar in Tuscarry, and still continued the war against Florence. The courage of Charles, the new Florentine governor, was far from answering expectations. Instead of taking the field in Success of refon, he gave the command of his army to Novello, one their geneof his officers, who took Monte Alverno in fight of Castruccio, ral. and befreged Artimini, which furrendered upon an honourable apitulation. While Novello was in this career of success, he was recalled by Charles, to oppose the emperor, who had pled the Appennines, and was in full march towards Pifa. Nevello's return to Florence, gave Castruccio leisure to pay his respects to the emperor, and to make him a present of a considerable sum of money. By this time the Pisans, having conceived an invincible aversion to the emperor, came to resolution to deny him admittance into their city. This was the more remarkable, because they were amongst the first of the Italians who had invited him into Italy; but his exclusion was owing to the rapaciousness of himself and his attendants, great numbers of whom were Franciscan monks m. The Pisans, however, that they might keep some measures of decency with him, offered him fixty thousand florins, if he would postpone his visit to their city. The offer was resused, and the Pisans dismissed all the German cavalry that was in their pay, but kept their horses; and came to the resolution, if they were attacked, to call to their aid Charles and the Florentines. Lewis had intelligence of all those proceedings, and Florence owed her liberty, at this time, to the firmness of the Pisans, and the differences between Castrucio and the bishop of Arezzo.

G 2

1327.

A. D. 1328.

State of Italy.

THE state of Italy was now very singular. The pope had less power there than he had in any part of the Christian world. There was indeed a great party who called themfelves Guelphs; but they affected this distinction only to keep themselves independent of the Imperialists, and his holiness durst not even trust his person in Rome, but generally resided at Lyons, or some other part of France. Notwithstanding this, though the pope had little power, he had great influence Being insatiably covetous, he had amassed five and twenty millions of florins of gold, above fix millions sterling money, for the places and benefices he fold; and the flates and princes, who called themselves Guelphs, paid him no other acknowledgment for the great convenience they found in sheltering themselves under his name and authority. Thus the pope and they were of mutual service to each other. The extravagant power of excommunicating fovereign princes, which he assumed and exercised, served them as a pretext to keep them free from the imperial yoke. The emperor, on the other hand, carried his claims to as extravagant a pitch as the pope, by pretending to fucceed to all the rights and dominions of the old Roman emperors in Italy, and even to that of making popes; while at the same time he was childifhly devoted to the superstition and sollies of the papal religion; and his power in Italy, like that of the pope, confifted in a great measure in the conveniency which the Gibelins found in opposing their enemies under the sanction of his authority.

LEWIS thought it of dangerous consequence to his affairs to be résused admittance into Pisa, and appointed commissioners to treat with the magistracy, who would not suffer them to enter the city; but consented to send deputies to treat with the bishop of Arezzo, upon their receiving a safe

m Voltaire.

conduct

and to their return, which they accordingly did; but so thing could be agreed upon. The deputies in going back to Pifa, were intercepted by Castruccio; and the bishop complained of Castruccio to the emperor, as if the affront had been offered to his honour, under which the deputies had treated. Castruccio replied with equal spirit, and each recriminated on the other; but it was very discernable, that the emperor was most inclinable to savour Castruccio. This dispersional that he prelate so much, that he lest Lewis, and probably the bishop would have reconciled himself to the pope and the Florentines, of Arezzo. The had not died in his journey to Arezzo.

AFTER the bishop's departure, Costruccio acted as general and sole minister to the emperor. The Pisans continuing restactory, their city was besieged and taken; but we know of no severities inflicted on the inhabitants, farther than that they were burthened with the entertainment of the emperor for almost two months, and forced to surnish him with a sum of money, and other necessaries, for continuing his journey to Rome.

CHARLES of Naples no sooner heard that the emperor was set out for Rome, than calling together a general assembly of the Florentines, he laid before them the necessity he was under of returning to defend Naples against the emperor and Castruccio; but he acquainted them, that he would leave them for his deputy-governor Philip, one of his ablest generals, with one thousand horse to assist him. He then he set out for Naples by the way of Sienna and Perugia.

UPON the departure of Charles, Philip resolved on an en-Pistoia trprize, which makes a great figure in the Florentine history; taken by and that was no less than the surprizal of Pistoia, where the Flo-Costruccio had lest seven hundred men in garrison, all of them rentines. thoice troops. He concerted his measures with two Pistoian Guelph exiles, who promised to be his conductors, and a Nea-Milan nobleman, whose name was Simon Tosa. All others were ignorant of his delign; and this probably was the chief rason why it succeeded. In consequence of their agreement, he marched to Prate, where he prepared scaling ladders, and other inftruments and machines for his purpose; and being attended with a body of two thousand foot, and six hundred horse, he arrived that very night under the walls of Pistoia. It was then the dead of winter, and the frost so severe, that the waters in the ditches were passable, whereby the exiles ame near enough to the walls to mount them by the affif-

MANETTI ubi supra, pag. 1044.

tance of their scaling ladders; and they were followed by, about one hundred of their party; while those without, pat-fing the ditches, attempted with pick-axes, and other instruments they brought with them, to penetrate the walls, in which at last they made two small breaches.

In the mean while the commandant of the place, in going his rounds, perceiving what was passing, alarmed the garrie. fon, who, at first imagining that the town had been betrayed by the inhabitants, were somewhat backward in standing too their arms; but seeing the townsmen, who were by this times likewise alarmed, charge the enemy with great vigour, there feconded them so well, that the Florentines who had entered must have been cut in pieces or driven back, had not the breaches been so widened, that Philip entered them at the head of some of his horse, by which means he somewhat checked the fury of the townsmen and the garrison. withstanding this, the latter was so well supported, that the affailants must have been repelled with great loss, had the not found means to fet fire to the gates, by which the whole body, both of horse and foot, entered the place, and with great flaughter to themselves, as well as their enemies, gained fome ground, and pushed on towards the market-place. This fuccess was in a great measure owing to the active intrepidity of Philip, who exposed himself to all kinds of danger, and ordered a body of his horse to secure the breaches fo as to take from his own foldiers all hopes of flying. The affailants were likewise greatly favoured by the confusion and hurry of the women, children, and the more fearful part of the citizens, which greatly alarmed and difordered the garrison and townsmen; and Castruccio's two sons, retiring with the garrison to the citadel, the townsmen returned to their several The Florentines, seeing now no enemy, dispersed themselves all over the town; so that when Philip marched to force the citadel, he was attended with a very inconfider able number of his foldiers, and those mostly officers. The garrison observing this, attacked him with great fury; and it was with the utmost difficulty he could maintain his ground till day-break, when his straggling soldiers, hearing of their general's danger, and ashamed of their own irregularities, rejoined him; while the garrison retired to the citadel, which they foon after abandoned. The Florentines, becoming thus absolute masters both of the town and citadel, again gave a loose, not, perhaps, without leave from their general, to the spirit of rapine, and plundered equally friends as foes. As to Philip, having tettled affairs, and left a garrison in Pistoia.

he returned, in ten days from his first setting out upon his expedition, to Florence, where he was received with triumphal

In the mean while, the emperor and his confort had en- The emtered Rome; and though he had been formerly excommuni-peror cated by the pope, he was received there as emperor by the crowned at Gibelin faction, and crowned emperor, by two excommunic Rome. cated bishops, on the seventeenth of Fanuary, 1328, without taking the usual oath of fidelity to the holy see. The Romans, at this time, feemed to have forgot there was such a person as a pope in being. The Colonna, the Urfini, the Sawelli, and Conti families, who were the great barons of Rame, and its territory, supported the imperial against the papal dignity; and Lewis appeared on all occasions in imperial robes, and as lord paramount of all Italy. Castruccio continued to be still his distinguished favourite; and such was the confidence he reposed in him, that he gave him not only the title of count, but the government of Rome.

THERE is some reason for believing that those honours were paid Castruccio, not more on account of his personal merits, than from the apprehensions Lewis was under from his active ambitious spirit. When Castruccio understood, (which he did in three days after the thing happened) that Pistoia was loft, he forgot himself so far as even to reproach the emperor for having obliged him to attend him; and without more ceremony he left Rôme, attended with his own troops, who were one thousand cross-bows, a weapon at that time greatly used in Italy, and fix hundred chosen horse, and fet out for Pifa; but in his march, through impatience and folicitude, he left his troops behind him, and through almost impassable dangerous roads he entered Pila, with no more than twelve followers. The Pifans, seeing him so flightly attended, received him with great respect; and his first care was to place a well-provided garrison in Murli, which lay in the neighbourhood of Pistoia. He then returned to Pifa, where, being supported by the Imperialists, whose cause he said was the same as his own, he raised money for executing his defigns.

GRATITUDE is seldom the distinguishing virtue of repub- Difference licans. Notwithstanding the extasses with which the Floren- between tines had received Philip, upon his return from his Pistoian the Floexpedition, they foon fell at variance with him when, he in- rentines filled upon their being at the expence of providing all things and Phinecessary for keeping possession of Pistoia. They pleaded, lip. that they had punctually performed all agreements with his master, and that he ought to provide for the safety of the place out of the plunder he had carried from it. Philiplied, by urging the laws and practice of war; and in the heat of the dispute, the security of Pissia was unvided for. Castruccio was minutely informed of all passed; and, before the parties could come to an accordation, he besieged Pissia with a great army, which hassembled at Pisa and Lucca.

G 4:

Pistoia befieged, assembled at Pisa and Lucca. SIMON TOSA, the Florentine nobleman we have al mentioned, commanded at that time in Pissoia, with a rison of one thousand foot and three hundred horse, a by all the Pistoian Guelphs. No sooner was it known a rence that the fiege was formed, than the citizens ! proceeding from the extreme of frugality to that of spirit, offered to devote their lives and fortunes to Phil the relief of the town, and actually raised an army of to thousand foot and three thousand horse; at the head of Philip went to give battle to Castruccio. The latter's ligence was fo good, that he knew the place had with but two months provision; and being no stranger to the lities of Philip, he resolved to act upon the desensive in the mean while he seemed to make such disposition engaging, as prevented the Florentines from attacking ! his camp. Castruccio made use of the time which th lay gave him, in fortifying his camp with trees and lifades, which he cut down in the neighbourhood; for when the Florentines, tired out with long expectation tually attacked it, they found it impregnable. This pointment threw the Florentines into great consternation vain they challenged Castruccio, by the sound of a trumpets in their army, to fight them; and at last, fi no other object to employ them, they resolved to pl the defenceless territories of Pisa and Lucca, which the cordingly did. Even this did not shake Castruccio in his pose. Almost three months were now elapsed since the had been formed. The garrison was reduced to the mouthful of their provision; they saw their friends ab them; they had no farther prospect of relief; and Cal wifely offering them an honourable capitulation, they f dered the place, and marched out with what we now the honours of war.

and retaken.

THE Florentine historians a, with great justice, thin retaking of Pissoia to be the most shining action of Cio's life; and undoubtedly, every thing considered, it so a vast superiority of military genius over all his coten

ARETINI, pag. 116. MANETTI ubi supra, pag. 10.

in that age, a new spectacle to behold a conqueror take possession of a strong city in the fight, as it were, of a far superior army sent to relieve it. The Florenting could scarce believe their own eyes; but within a very few days they received still more mortifying news. The emperor, who had all this time remained at Rome, provoked by the pope's bull, by which he was divested of all his titles and possessions, summoned together at Rome a general assembly, wherein he was so presumptuous as to act as pope. He or- The emdered no bishop to be absent above three months, and two peror acts days journey, from their sees, under pain of deprivation, and as pepe. others being elected in their room. He then passed sentence of death upon all heretics, and particularly upon the pope, whom he termed John de Cahors, from the place of his nativity, and whom he likewise condemned for high treason against the imperial dignity. After this Lewis, in another grand affembly of clergy and laity, produced a cordelier, talled father Peter de Corvaria, and asked the assembly whether they would have him for their pope. Upon their answering in the affirmative, he invested him with the papacy, by putting a ring on his finger, and throwing a robe over his shoulders. He then gave him the name of Nicholas V. together with a solemn induction into the papacy; and he was crowned by his hands, as if his first coronation had been irregular. Robert king of Naples was doomed to the same death, as pope John had been by Lewis; nor is it easy to conceive what could drive so prudent a prince, as Lewis is acknowledged to have been, into such frantic measures, if he had not intended to reside in Italy. Without hazarding farther conjectures, it is certain that he was disappointed in the affishance of a fleet he expected from Sicily; and he was so far from being able to make any impression upon Robert by land, that he every day expected to be belieged in Rome by that prince. At the same time he had certain intelligence from Germany, that the princes there were forming cabals against him, and that he was in danger of being stripped of the imperial dignity. For these and other reasons, but above all, because he saw some of the great Roman families disgusted with his conduct, he removed from Rome to Terni, and openly declared, that he intended to make himself master of Florence; by which declaration all the Tuscan Gibelins resorted to his army, which thereby became very formidable.

This impending danger, with the certain accounts the Danger of Florentines received at the same time of the great prepara-Florence. tions making against them by Castruccio, and the petty states which lay towards the soot of the Appennines, threw them into the utmost consternation; but they soon recovered themselves. and, like men of fense, they resolved to provide against the worst, and to sell their liberties as dear as they could. They fummoned their confederates to their affishance; strengthened repaired, and revictualled their garrisons, and augmented their forces, determining bravely to wait for the event. Two incidents happened which gave them vast relief. The Sicilian. fleet, commanded by Peter, fon to the king of Sicily, joined. by that of the Genoese Gibelins, was now at sea; and Peter sent feveral messages to the emperor, entreating him to return to Rome. This produced a kind of a negotiation, which relaxed the preparations of the emperor, who had by this time advanced as far as Arezzo, and gave the Florentines à farther respite. The other incident was far more in their fayour; for at this very critical juncture the famous Castruccie. their capital enemy, died, being worn out by his military fase tigues. His death was followed by that of their other implacable enemy, Galeazzo, viscount of Milan, which happened at Pescia, Death of Castruccio.

Good for-Floren-Tines.

THE Florentines could scarcely give credit to their good, sune of the fortune, when they heard of the death of Castruccio, who left behind him two fons, yet in their nonage, and under the tutelage of their mother and relations. As foon as the emperor, who was still in treaty with the Sicilians, heard of Castruccio's death, he went by sea to Pisa, and gave over all farther thoughts of molesting the Florentines; who, being freed from that terror, thought now of acting offenfively. Their first attempt was upon Artemini, which had been taken' from them by Castruccio: they attacked it with so much vigour, that, though it was very well garrifoned, they carried the town, and granted a capitulation to the castle, after eight days siege. In the mean while Lewis, who still remained in Italy, came to Pifa, and there deprived Castruccio's children and friends of the government, which he bestowed upon Tarlati, brother to the late bishop of Arezze. From thence he went to Lucca, and, notwithstanding all the presents given, and applications made to him by Castruccio's widow, he gave the government of that city to one of his own generals; but exacted heavy contributions both thera. and at Pisa, as an acknowledgment for their recovered hiberties.

> ABOUT this time, to compleat the good fortune of the Florentines, their governor Charles, son to the king of Naples, died. The Florentines confidered his death as a great delia verance, on account of the prodigious fums of money which his rapacious Neapolituns carried from Florence. They, therefore, applied themselves to the regulation of their govern-Alterations ment with great assistance, and instituted two councils for the in the gomanagement of their most important affairs; one composed vernment of plebeians only; the other, which they called the mixed of Flocouncil, equally of plebeians and nobles. They likewise re-rence. Stricted the duration of the gonfalonier's office, from fix to some four months.

> > fore,

A. D. 1329.

This year the Florentines gave a figual proof of the firmness and wisdom of their government. The emperor Liwis, who was still at Pisa, notwithstanding the vast sums he had exacted of the Italian states, was both poor and contemptible; and eight hundred of his cavalry left his fervice for want of pay. Their design at first was to have surprised Lucca; but being disappointed, they subsisted by ravaging the neighbouring country; and at last offered their service to the Florentines, who, after long deliberation, rejected it, as being too dangerous for their public liberty. This refusal multiplied disorders in the open country; and Lewis, being asraid of the consequences, treated with them, by Azo, now viscount of Milan, who engaged to pay them the arrears they demanded. The mutineers accordingly named some agents, who received the money from Azo, but carried it off to Germany; and this disappointment farther incensed the mutineers, who were the flower of the emperor's army, so that he came to a resolution of immediately returning to Germany. Castrucco's fons thought this a favourable opportunity for endeavouring to reposses themselves of Pistoia, which had likewise been taken from them, and garrisoned by Lewis: and drawing together a great number of their father's friends and followers, they found means to enter the place, but were soon driven out by the inhabitants.

The historian of Florence a takes notice, though not in the order of time, of a kind of Catilinarian conspiracy, which was this year formed at Florence, to burn the city, and admit into it the troops of Lewis and Castruccio. We are likewise told, that upon searching the houses of the inhabitants, evidences of the plot were discovered; and that, some of the conspirators being put to death, the city returned to a state of tranquility. We are however apt, from the manner in which this plot is introduced and related, to believe that it was of the Florentine government's own making, to give them a handle for taking off some citizens they suspected.

THE emperor had now passed the Appennines in his return to Germany, in no very creditable circumstances. He had lest the pope of his own creation at Pisa, in a most forlorn condition; and he was refused admittance into Milan by Azo, whom, till then, he took to be his creature. During his treaty with the mutineers, who had left his service, he had tent Marco Visconti, one of his chief officers, to their camp, as a hostage, and he was there detained; but being a person of great abilities and credit in the army, they no fooner heard of the emperor's departure for Germany, than they chose him to be their general, and encamped on an eminence that overlooks Lucca. Having now the face of a regular army, the German garrison of Lucca put Marco in possession of that city, and he offered to give it up to the Florentines, on two conditions; first, that the Florentines should pay his army all their arrears, which amounted to a very large fum: fecondly, that fome provision should be made for the family of Castruccio, with whom Marco lived in the most intimate friendship. The matter was most seriously debated at Florence: and Aretin b has given us a very fine speech made by Pino Tofa, a Florentine nobleman, to persuade his countrymen to accept of the offer. Private animolities, however, prevailed to greatly at that time amongst the Florentines, that it was rejected, on pretext that the sum required was too large, and that Lucca would entirely fall under the dominion of the Florentines, without their being at such an expence.

FLORENCE, from being but a few months before on the brink of perdition, was now at the fummit of her glory, courted and revered by all the free states of Italy. Pistoians sent a deputation to implore her friendship and protection, which the Florentines readily granted. The terms were, that all the Pistoian exiles should be restored, and that the Florentines should be put in possession of Murli, Carmini, and other places. This advantageous treaty induced the Florentines to bestow a particular compliment upon those Pistoians, who had been most active in bringing it about. Giacome Stroza, a Florentine nobleman, or knight, was deputed by the republic to repair to Pistoia, where, in her name, he invested four of the inhabitants with the equestrian honours of Florence, and made each of them a handsome present in mo-Magnificent public entertainments of feasting and shews of the Flo- were exhibited at the same time. This peace, so honourable for both parties, occasioned many of the proprietors of forts in the territories of Lucca to put themselves under the protection of the Florentines, and even the Pisans had the spirit to expel out of their city Tarlati, the imperial governor left them by Lewis, and to call in Marco Visconti for their protector. Visconti after this repaired to Florence, where he was received with distinguished honours, and renewed the negotiation between the Florentines and the German garrison at Lucca. This negotiation proving ineffectual, Murco left Tufcony; and the Pisans immediately offered to strike the bargain which the Florentines had rejected, by paying the Germans their arrears, on condition of taking policition of Lucca. This step was considered by the Florentines in so unfavourable a light, that they immediately denounced war against the Pi- War with lans; and invaded their state. About this time Catino, a Pila. town which had put itself under the protection of the Florentines, expelled their garrison; as did several other places, by the instigation of Castruccio's party and samily. America Donati, a Florentine nobleman, was appointed to the command of an army for reducing them; in which he succeeded so well, that the Pisans now sued for peace and obtained it. Catino, however, still held out, and a new scene was opened at Lucca. There the Pisans, being unable or unwilling to perform their promises to the garrison, Spinola, a Genoese nobleman of immense riches, was, by the Germans, put in possession of the city, and acted with great lenity, in hopes of reconciling the Lucquese to his government, offering, at the same time, to enter into a treaty with the Florentines.

Prosperity

• Page 119 and 120.

THE latter had all along flattered themselves of becoming Progress of masters of Lucca, without any expence: they therefore re-the year. jected all Spinola's advances, pressed the siege of Catino with more fury than ever, and practifed with the garrifons in the neighbourhood to induce them to throw off the Lucquese yoke, which fome of them did. Spinola and the Lucquese, upon this, marched against one of the revolted garrisons, which they took, and put all the Florentines in it to the sword. They then returned home in high spirits, to make new and Siege of more powerful levies for the relief of Catino, being encouraged Catino. by a report that they were to be strongly supported by the emperor. This extraordinary shew of resolution in the Lucquele determined the Florentines to more vigorous operations against the town, which they now compleatly surrounded with a strong rampart and ditch, the last being filled with water from a neighbouring river. According to the Florentine historian a, this work would have done honour even to the old Romans. He tells us, the ditch and the rampart ran through a level plain fix miles in length; that where it was impossible to carry it on, by reason of the unevenness of the ground, a wall was run up, which was strengthened with bastions at a fmall distance from one another; and that the compass of the whole was about twelve miles. Spinola, however, receiving a reinforcement of German horse, attacked this fortification with great obstinacy; but was beaten off, through the excellent dispositions made by the Florentines, who seem in this fiege to have copied the conduct of Castruccio at the siege of Pistoia. At the extremity of the ditch lay the castle of Sevia, and, by reason of its great distance from the Lucquese, the guard was but flight in that quarter. Spinola, understanding this, marched in the night-time a body of troops, which forced their way within the Florentine entrenchments, being favoured by a strong attack which the Lucquese made upon another quarter. The Florentines, however, perceived their danger, by their enemies drawing off from the attack as foon as their party made a fignal of their having entered the entrenchments, and haftening to support them. The Florentines, being nearest to the place of danger, were the first who attacked them, and fought with such vigour, that the Germans and Lucquese, who had entered the entrenchments, were either driven out of them, or obliged to take refuge in Catino. This disappointment did not daunt the spirit of the Lucquese, who, in their attack at Serra, made Giacomo Medicis, a noble Florentine knight, prisoner. The operations were carried on with infinite obstinacy on both sides; but so much to the advantage of the Florentines, who were perpetually relieving one another from their capital, that Spinola was at last forced to retreat to Pescia; and the garrison of Catino, unable to hold longer out, furrendered the place upon an honourable capitulation. Florentines debated long amongst themselves, whether they should demolish Catino; but the strength and importance of its fituation determined them to preferve it.

² Leon. Aret. Hist. Flor. p. 122.

9 be Florentines besiege Lucca. The success of the siege of Catino, and some other advantages obtained about the same time, gave such reputation and spirit to the Florentines, that they resolved to besiege Lucca itself; to which they were greatly encouraged by the losses the Lucquese had lately received, their now having no allies they could depend upon for relief, and the distressed state of the emperor's affairs in Germany. The anti-pope, who had been created by the emperor, after skulking for some time about Italy, was sent prisoner by the archbishop of Pisa to his rival John XXII. before whom he presented himself with a halter about his neck, and was by him committed to prison, he died three years after. The Florentines, having now no where enemy in Italy they could dread, laid a vigorous siege to Lucca, and made themselves masters of all the neighbouring fortiscations.

The place was defended by Spinola, who was on the point of giving it up, when affairs took a sudden turn against the besiegers. About the year 1331, John king of Bobemia, son to the emperor Henry of Luxemburg, marched with an army into Lombardy, in quality of vicar of the empire. Having reduced Brescia, and a great many places in that neighbourhood, Bergamo particularly, he received a deputation from Spinola and the Lucquese, offering to put themselves under his protection, provided he would raise the siege. John had his reasons for attempting to sooth the Florentines, and fent an ambassador to Florence to prevail with the magistracy and people to recal their troops from before Lucca; but all applications of that kind proved ineffectual, and John marched with his army to raise the siege. This would have been no easy matter, had not a spirit of mutiny happened at that very time to take possession of the Florentine troops, who had insulted the Lucquese with the most wanton abuse; so that the Florentine generals thought proper to draw off their army, The fiege is after having continued for almost five months before the place. raised. Simon, a noble Pistoian, who acted as John's general, upon the retreat of the Florentines, found an easy admittance into Lucca; and, after establishing his master's authority there, he entered the Florentine dominions at the head of twelve hundred horse and two thousand foot, and having laid them waste, he returned without any loss to Lucca: an infult for which he must have dearly paid, had it not been for the jealousies and divisions which still reigned amongst the Florentines. About this time John made himself master of Parma, Cremona, Pavia, Modena, and other places; so that he grew very formidable in Italy. He found, however, that he could not maintain his ground without leaguing himself with the pope; and, to the amazement of all Europe, from being mortal enemies, they ran into a strict alliance with one another. His holiness, on this occasion, employed his legate at Bologna as his plenipotentiary; and though he hated John, yet he knew his affairs were so embarrassed in Germany, that he must be quickly obliged to quit Italy, and therefore that his conquests could not be very permanent. Robert, king of Naples, and the Florentines, had hitherto continued faithfully attached to the pope; but feeing this unnatural conjunction between his boliness and John, they entered into a consederacy against both, in which they were joined by several of the other Italian frates. The consequence of this alliance was, that the Piftoians put themselves under the protection of Florence, and even admitted a Florentine garrison into their city. Continuing however to exercise the outward marks of govern-5

ment, they were considered neither as being the subjects northe allies of Florence. The Lucquese, about the same time, besieged and took possession of the small town of Barga, which was under the Florentine protection, the Florentines in vain endeavouring to raise the siege.

The system of power in Italy altered.

By this time the whole system of power in Italy was changed; but it must be said, to the glory of the Fiorentines. that they stuck much firmer than any other Italian state did to the principles of their constitutional independency. John, king of Bohemia, had been obliged to return to Germany; but he had left his fon Charles at the head of his affairs and armies in Italy. The strict alliance that still subsisted between Charles and the legate of Bolegna, at last prevailed with the princes of Ferrara, Verona, Mantua, and even Milan, though Azo, as we have already seen, was the sworn soe of Florence, to join in the confederacy with the Florentines and the king of Naples: and we may form some estimate of the several degrees of power the parties were possessed of, by the contingents each was obliged to fend to their common defence; for of three thousand horse which they agreed to bring into the field, the Florentines were to furnish fix hundred; the king of Naples as many; Mastino, prince (who was commonly then called Dom of Verona, eight hundred; Azo, viscount of Milan, fix hundred; and the princes or dukes (for their titles at this time were as unfettled as their power) of Ferrara and Mantua, two hundred each. The legate was making war in the Ferrarese when he heard of this powerful confederacy taking place; and he immediately fent deputies to expostulate with the Florentines, and, if possible, to draw them off from the alliance. The answer returned by the Florentines was modest. but firm: they represented the great services they had often done to the see of Rome; but seemed surprised at being reproached for entering into measures against the son and grandfon of the emperor Henry of Luxemburg, who had been their mortal enemy. This situation of affairs in Italy, recalled John king of Bohemia from Germany, and he was met by his fon Charles at Parma. Here he learned, that Mastino of Verona had seized Brescia and Bergamo, as Azo had Pavia. Charles, who brought back with him a small but choice army, endeavoured to retake Pavia, and to relieve the citadel, which fill held out; but being baffled by Azo, he was obliged to retreat to Parma, after laying waste the Milanese. His confederate the legate had better success. He beat the Ferrarese in a pitched battle, and laid siege to Ferrara itself. The besteged immediately applied for affistance to the Florentines. who appeared very willing to relieve them; but found it an enter-interprize of great difficulty, the victorious legate being in possession of all the country of Romagna and the Bolognese, is John's troops were of all the strong important passes by the way of Modena and Parma. The Florentines, however, that they might not be wanting to their allies, fent them four hundred horse, under the command of two young noblemen, Stroza and Scala, by the long detours of Genoa, Milan, and Verona, in all which cities they were received with the greatest respect and affection. They arrived at Verona just as king John and the legate were preparing to give a general assault to Ferrara, and the king was for that purpose bringing a reinforcement from Parma. They were prevented by the ardour of the Florentines, who no fooner threw themselves into Ferrara than they resolved to attack the camp of the besiegers. The Florentine historian b is, with great justice, proud of his The Flocountrymen's behaviour, on this occasion, against the best rentines troops of Germany, whom they defeated with great slaughter, defeat the or drove into the Po, where numbers were drowned by the Germans. breaking down of the bridge. The victory was so complete, that all Romagna revolted from the legate; and Bologna would have done the same, had it not been kept in awe by John's German horse. While Yohn was thus employed in affishing the legate, Castruccio's sons, having drawn together a large body of their father's friends, who were still very numerous in Italy, surprised Lucca; but the citadel holding out, John made a quick march, and dispossessed them of their new conquest. This year was remarkable for prodigious inundations all over Italy; and the bridges at Florence, over the Arno, being broken down, it appeared like two cities, which gave some uneasiness to the jealous plebeians, lest the nobles, who lived in a separate quarter, should make use of that opportunity to cabal against their liberty; but the public resumed its tranquility when the loss was repaired by some temporary bridges.

SECT. V.

Containing the History of the war between Florence and Scaliger, prince of Verona. The Florentines purchase Arezzo; they are defeated by the Pilans; chuse the duke of Athens for their stadtholder, or governor; conspiracies against him; he is driven out. Dissentions in Florence; ascendency of the people.

T was now high time for the confederate states to consult A general measures for their future operations, and to divide their con-confederacy quests. Deputies from all of them met at Lerice, then be-takes place.

h Aretin. pag. 126.

longing to the Genoese. Here great disputes arose: at last i was determined, that the viscount of Milan should keep possession of Cremona, the prince of Verona of Parma, the duke of Mantua of Reggio, the duke of Ferrara of Modena, and the Florentines of Pila. It is to be observed, that some of those territories remained still to be conquered; but the confede rates agreed not to lay down their arms till each was in ful possession of his allotment, which determined them to profecute the war with double vigour. They began with the legate, a Frenchman by birth, and in his manners insolent severe, and haughty beyond expression. He had fled to Be logna, after the victory the confederates had obtained nea Ferrara; but the emperor being now returned to Germany he was so unpopular at Bologna, that the inhabitants ran to arms, beat his guards, and forced him to fly to the citadel which he had built for bridling that city, and to which the Bolognese laid close siege. The Florentines, though they has no reason to be satisfied with the legate's person, yet the could not consider his character without wishing to save him They therefore fent four deputies, with three hundred hors and a large body of foot, to Bologna, where the deputies me diated for the legate; and with infinite difficulty, after nego tiating for several days, it was agreed, that his passage should be safe, upon his surrendering the citadel to the townsmer The people, however, held the legate in fuch abhorrence that they would have torn him to pieces, had he not bee guarded by the Florentines, night and day. He was first cas ried to Florence, and from thence to Pifa, where he embarke for the pope's dominions, who was still at Avignon.

The Gercenaries mutiny.

Amongst the unconquered places, partitioned out by the man mer- treaty of Lerice, was Parma, which was now belieged by the confederates, while the Florentines undertook that of Lucia The rendezvous of all the confederates being before Parish the Florentines demanded that a body of troops should mare over the Appennines, to affift them at the fiege of Lucca. the mean while, the legate, by his intrigues and money having debauched the German mercenaries who served in confederate army, they mutinied, and threw themselves it Parma. Their defertion obliged Scaliger (A), prince of F rona, to raise the siege of Parma, and the Florentines to giover that of Lucca. The fiege of Parma was foon after fumed by Scaliger, and the Florentines made dispositions # > and the two learned Scaligers, a dream, concerning a man-Joseph and Julius, pretended dog, which his mother preter that he was their immediate ancestor. He was called the Mas- child by him.

(A) This was his true name; tino, or Mastiff of Verona, fre ed she had, when she was wthying on that of Lucca; upon which John king of Bohemia, so sovereign, made a present of that city to the French king. A vast number of Florentine merchants, men of great property, refided then in France; and that king immediately intimated to them the gift that had been made him, in hopes that their interest would prevail with their countrymen to give over the slege of Lucca. But he was deceived; for the Florentines still continued their preparations; and the French king being informed by the king of Naples, that John had disposed of a territory in which he had no legal property, the claim was dropt. This year, viz. 1334, died pope John XXII. and his death gave a great turn to the affairs of Italy. He was fucceeded by Benedict XII. who, like his predecessor, resided at Avignon. The Florentines, the better to succeed in their defigns against Lucca, negotiated a treaty with Peter, the governor or prince of Arezzo, who had employed the great treafures, left him by his brother the bilhop, in dispossessing the neighbouring noblemen of their fiels and castles. drove them, particularly Nerio Fagiolani, the son of the Fagiolani who had been dispossessed by Castruccio, to league themselves with the Perugians, who hated Peter; and Nerio surprised Burgo, a town about fourteen miles from Arezzo; but the castle holding out, Peter prepared to march to its relief. The Perugians endeavoured to divert him, by invading the territories of Arezzo; but were defeated with great flaughter by Peter. The Florentines, upon this, mindful that the Perugians had been their ancient allies, took part with them, and broke off their treaty with Peter, who was supported by the Genoese. This attachment of the Florentines to their al-Honourable lies, was to them more honourable than advantageous. Sca-conduct of liger was by this time in possession of Parma, as the duke of the Flo-Mantua was of Reggio, and the Ferrarese of Modena. In rentines. thort, all parties in the confederacy, Florence excepted, were in the quiet possession of the spoils allotted them.

WHEN John king of Bohemia left Italy, he committed the government of Parma and Lucca to three brothers, called Ruffo, nobles of Parma. Two of them commanded in that city when it was taken by the Veronese; and it was agreed that the third brother should surrender Lucca to Scaliger, upon certain terms. The Florentines, far from opposing this convention, forwarded it, in hopes that Scaliger would make no other use of it than that of facilitating their taking possession. Scaliger, accordingly, having promised to repay to the three brothers a large fum they had advanced to the king of Bohemia, took possession of Lucca; but when the Florentines, by their deputies, demanded that the terms of the consederacy should be fulfilled, he required that the money he H 2 repaid should be refunded to him. The sum was no less than three hundred and fixty thousand crowns of gold (B), which may answer to about one hundred thousand pounds sterling. The cunning Veronese thought that the mention of so much money would deter the Florentines from prosecuting their demand; but as Aretin d justly observes, it is almost incredible to what extremes their public spirit often drove them: for they, who, but twelve or fourteen months before, had refused to pay the fourth part of that fum to the Germans for the same end, offered to raise it for Scaliger; who thereupon invented other pretexts for delay; and the Florentine deputies, perceiving they were trifled with, returned home. Scaliger forefaw the consequences, and was the first to take the field: upon which the Florentines immediately declared war against Scaliger, the Veronese, and all his abettors in his injustice.

Power of

THE reader is to observe, that Scaliger was at this time Scaliger. one of the richest and most powerful princes in Lombardy. Being in possession not only of Verona, but of Parma and Lucca, besides a vast number of other places along the Appennines, his dominions had a ready communication one with another, and he was fure of having the Pisans for his friends. Add to this, that his court and army were rendezvouses for all the malcontents of Italy; and being naturally vain, as well. as ambitious, he was in hopes of becoming master of all Tuscany.

General reflection.

AFTER the many expensive and bloody wars that the Florentines, for half a century past, had maintained by turns against almost all the states of Italy, and sometimes against the most powerful princes in Europe, it is astonishing to think with what spirit they entered upon hostilities with their new enemy of Verona. But we are to confider, that, by means of their foreign commerce, the encouragement they gave to all ingenious arts, the strictness of their discipline, and the regularity of their government, they were now prodigiously rich; but their riches, far from enervating them, inspired them with ideas of rivalling the old Romans, not only in their sentiments, but their power. They proceeded, however, to war with the greatest economy, regularity, and resolution. They appointed twelve treasurers for raising the public money, and fix managers for distributing it in the service of the field, and for attending the camp and councils of war. They fent deputies to Milan, and to all their confederates in Lombardy, to

d Page 128.

⁽B) We have in this transaction followed Manetti, who wrote after Aretin (1).

⁽¹⁾ Vide Manetti apud Murat. tom. Xix. p. 1055.

melent to them the falshood and treachery of Scaliger; and they renewed their alliance with Perugia and Sienna, in order to give a diversion to Peter of Arezzo, if he should join with The Perugians, animated by the Florentines, attacked the territory of Arezzo, and surprised Citta di Castello: which discouraged the Arezzians so greatly, that many of their fores fell into the hands of the Florentines.

We are not to forget, for the honour of Florence, that while the was thus profecuting an expensive war, the was cultivating the arts of peace, to more perfection than they were to be found in any other part of the world. Though the Greeks had not yet imported their literature into Italy, the Florentines had reformed themselves from that barbarous taste in the fine arts, that still continued to infect all the rest of Europe. Giotto at this time worked in Florence, where he The marble was in great reputation; and though he cannot be faid to have tower built carried the arts of architecture and painting to the perfection by Giotto. they afterwards attained, yet the good manner he introduced in both had more merit over the barbarous state in which he found them, than any after-improvements had over him. This year, according to Aretin, viz. 1335, he founded, and afterwards brought to perfection, the famous quadrangular marble tower, faid to be one hundred and forty-four ells in height e, which now stands near the cathedral of Florence.

THE war still continued; but Scaliger being obliged to go Scaliger to Verma, the scene of action lay in the Arezzian territories, attacks which the Florentines and Perugians ravaged with vast fury. Florence. Intelligence came, in the mean while, that Scaliger was advancing through the Romagna, against Florence, with eight bundred horse; upon which the Florentines sent an army to pin their allies the Bolognese, and to intercept his march. This to make some incurupon the Florentine territories, and the Florentines atimpted to transfer the feat of the war to Lombardy; but Scawas so formidable there, that they could get no state to in them but that of Venice, which became now jealous of reighbourhood of Verona to that of some of their territoin consequence of this alliance, a body of Florentine marched to Treviso, where they were joined by some Hostilities Mentines, and entered into hostilities against the Veronese. continue. his time, the brothers, the Ruffi, finding that Scaliger bled with them, as he had done with the Venetians, and reto pay the money he had promited them, were, for their Experientations on that head, expelled out of Lucca, and threw memelves into the town of Pontremoli, where they were bigged; but were, upon their application, taken into the alliance of the Florentines and Venetians. The siege of Ponremoli still continuing, Peter Ruffo, who was esteemed an excellent officer, repaired to Florence, and offered to the magistracy there to give them possession of Lucca, if they would put him at the head of a body of troops for that purpofe. He accordingly received eight hundred horse, and marched against that place. His true design was to draw off, to the defence of Lucca, the troops that were employed at the fiege of Pontremoli. The Italians, as yet, knew little of the art of belieging places, farther than blockading them, and forcing them to furrender by famine; so that the governor of Lucca. leaving a few to man the walls, fell, with all the other troops he could affemble, upon the Florentine territories. obliged Ruffo to draw off from Lucca, and a battle foon fol-": lowed; in which the Florentines, with great difficulty, came' off conquerors, Scaliger's general being made prisoner, with many others, and a great number killed in the pursuit. Two days after this, the Florentine army returned in triumph to that city, where Ruffo, on the credit of his late victory, was appointed general of the combined army of the Venetians and Florentines serving against Scaliger in Lombardy. Ruffo behaved so well in his new command, that he gained a vast " number of advantages over the enemy, and drove them to the walls of Padua, which was then in possession of Scaliger. Ruffo however could not bring the Veronese, though they were greatly superior to him in number, to a battle; and therefore he besieged Bovolenta, which lies within seven miles of Padua. His attacks were fo furious, that Scaliger thought now of now thing but covering Verona. He found means, however, to bring over, by the force of money, to his interest one thousand German horse, who served as mercenaries in Ruffo's army who, fetting fire to the camp of the confederates, marched of in the night-time. Ruffo, undaunted by this defertion, repaired the damage his camp had fustained, and continued him. operations, being still at the head of a formidable army. The other states of Lombardy, now seeing the danger of Scaliger whom they all hated, entered into the confederacy again him; and a great army of Milanese, Ferrarese, and Mantuant with Lucino Visconti at their head, rendezvoused at Mantue intending to proceed against Verona itself. At the same time Charles, son of John king of Bohemia, took Belluno arak Feltri.

! Buiching's New System of Geography, vol. iii. p. 122.

The courage and conduct of Scaliger.

SCALIGER, though furrounded by so many powers enemies, was not deficient in his conduct, either as a warred or a statesman. As Lucino, who by this time had been joined by a detachment of two thousand four hundred horse, under Marsilio, Ruffo's brother, had marched within a sew miles

From, he left that city at the head of three thousand horse and a body of foot, and offered battle to the confederates, which Lucino declined, though his army was greatly superior to that of Scaliger. This cowardice, or treachery of Lucino, to disgusted the troops under his command, that they immediately left the service. Upon this, Scaliger, to improve his good fortune, took post three miles below Bovolenta, where Ruffe was still encamped, with a view of intercepting Marfilio in his return to join his brother f. Aretin tells us, Ruffo was at this time in such danger, that he ordered his soldiers • to gather great quantities of bitter herbs, which grew in the mighbourhood, and to throw them into the waters of the Brent, which supplied Scaliger's army, and which thereby became so bitter as to be rendered unserviceable both to man and horse; so that Scaliger was obliged to decamp, and Marsilio rejoined his brother. Ruffo, without losing time, marched directly to Padua; where the citizens, instigated by Ubertino Carra, opened the gates to his army, and cut in pieces Scaliger's garrison, which was commanded by his brother Alberto, who was fent prisoner to Venice. But the joy which this important conquest occasioned at Venice and Florence, was quickly damped by the death of Ruffo, who, in storming Monselice, 2 place in the neighbourhood, received a wound in his thigh, which proved mortal upon his return to Padua. He was furvived but a few days by his brother Marsilio, who died of grief at the loss of Ruffo. About this time the Milanese made themselves masters of Brescia.

PETER, furnamed Saco, had still possession of Arezzo, The Floand was strongly solicited by the Arezzians to make peace with rentines the Florentines and their allies. This application served only purchase to render Peter jealous of the Arezzians; and he resolved Arezzo; to make the best terms he could with the Florentines, having many reasons for not trusting the Perugians. The bargain was foon struck. Peter agreed to deliver up Arezzo, and all its dependencies, for ten years, into the hands of the Florentimes, upon condition that he himself, whose mother was a Florentine, and his kinsmen, should, from thenceforward, be deemed citizens of Florence; that they should remain in possession of all their private estates and effects; that Peter should receive forty thousand crowns; and that seventeen thousand more, which he had borrowed from the Arezzians, should be paid to his mercenaries for their arrears. This negotiation being finished, twelve Florentine noblemen immediately repaired to Arezzo, where, to the great joy of the people, they wok possession of that government.

LEONARD. ARETIN. P 134.

which is rugians;

THE Perugians complained bitterly of this proceeding, as reclaimed being expressly against the treaties subsisting between them; by the Pe- and sent deputies to Florence, who exclaimed in very harsh terms against the Florentines. The answer of the latter (for Aretin has given us the speeches of both, or rather has made speeches for them) recriminated in as sharp terms, by accusing. the Perugians of infincerity, and telling them, that no terms ought to be kept with traitors. Upon cooler thoughts, however, both parties came to an accommodation, and the Perugians obtained possession of some towns of no great consequence in the Arezzian territory. Scaliger, hearing of those transactions, reinforced his garrison of Lucca under Accio, one but with of his generals; upon which the Florentines again took the field, and ravaged the territories of Lucca. This term, however, occurs so often in the Florentine historians, and the practice is so often repeated, that we cannot believe that it means any more than a body of troops subsisting for a few months, on free quarter, amongst their enemies; and, in sq fertile a country as Italy, the damage they did being generally repaired by next season, the like inroads were renewed.

The Veronese inthe Florentines;

NEXT year the Florentines and Venetians invaded the Veranele; and after infulting that city for some days, and gaining vaded by several advantages, they laid siege to Vicenza. This obliged Scaliger to fend a deputation to Venice to treat of peace, which was so favourably received, that the terms were soon settled. The marquifate of Trevife, one of the most delightful countries in Italy, with that city and territory, was ceded by Scaliger to the Venetians; and a proviso was left in the treaty, that, if the Florentines should incline to come into the peace, they should be put into possession of Pescia and Bugiani, and remain masters of all their conquests in the Lucquese territory. It was likewise stipulated, that all the Lucquese exiles, who ferved in the combined army, should be re-admitted to their estates and privileges in that city. The negotiation thus ended, the treaty was communicated to the Florentines, who, after long debates, disapproved of it; but sent three of their first noblemen to try if they could negotiate better terms at This was found impracticable; and the terms the Venetians had stipulated for them were agreed to, all parties being heartily tired of the war.

rubo enjoy Jome years of peace.

THE Florentines, after this, continued for some years in peace, and unmolested by any of their neighbours. recess from the labours of the field, and a few seasons that were unfavourable for the productions of the earth, together with some accidental storms of thunder and lightning, filled the minds of the Florentines, who were naturally superstitious, with many difinal apprehensions. These perhaps were greatly increased by an adnumberment of all the citizens living within Florence, which took place in the year 1339, who were found to amount to ninety thousand, which is twenty thousand more (C) than it is supposed to contain at present. This adnumberment was occasioned by the magistrates wanting, in the time of scarcity, to ascertain the quantities of provisions which it might be necessary to import. Next year a plague broke out in Florence, which carried off fixteen thoufand people in its city and territories. About the same time intestine divisions put the Florentines in arms, on account of a foreign magistrate who had been advanced to the government of the city, for two years, by the heads of the plebeians. His name is not mentioned by Aretin; but he tells us, that two great families, the Bardi and Frescobaldi, put themselves at the head of the nobility, with an intention to overturn the Tumults in magistracy; but they were disappointed by the spirit of the Florence. people, who immediately ran to arms, and obliged the nobility to abandon their undertaking. The people then returned peaceably home; but the chief of the nobility were impeached before the presidents, and none of them crossing the Arno, to appear in their own defence, sentence passed against them; in consequence of which their houses were demolished, and applications made to all the states confederated with Florence not to receive or protect them; so that the exiles were obliged to take shelter in Pi/a, the ancient and natural enemy of Florence.

A. D. 1340.

Soon after this, the Mantuans encouraged the people of Parma to throw off Scaliger's yoke; and he found himself so hardly beset by the Mantuans cutting off all communication between Verona and Lucca, that it was plain he could not keep the latter. The Florentines and the Pisans immediately became competitors for the prize, which was fairly put up by Scaliger at public auction, to be carried by the best bidder. The Florentines outbid the Pisans, by offering for the place two hundred and fifty thousand crowns.

rentines purchase Lucca.

(C) See Busching, tom. iii. p. 121. We are not, however, quite satisfied whether, under the word cives, Aretin, from whom the above adnumberment is taken, comprehends all the inhabitants, men, women, children, and fervants. That he does mot, seems most probable; because of the vast armies, sometimes amounting in the whole to above thirty thousand men, that we have mentioned to have marched out of Florence; a number of fighting men by far too great to be furnished by a city that contained no more than ninety thousand inhabitants.

THE Florentines being thus in possession of Arezzo, and . likely to be fo of Lucca, by means of the wealth they had gained in commerce, began now to be dreaded all over Italy. The Pisans, irritated by their disappointment of acquiring Lucca, set on foot a general confederacy against them, into which Lucino, who, by the death of Azo, was now viscount of Milan; and all Scaliger's enemies, who were very numerous, entered, as did the Milanese, the Mantuans, the Parmelans, and the Paduans; all of whom fent their contingencies of troops to affift the Pisans in the siege of Lucca, which was now formed. The Florentines upon this, having formally required of the Pisans to raise the siege, invaded the Pisan territories; but the siege was pressed more warmly than ever. Lucca was still in the possession of Scaliger, who now fummoned the Florentines to fulfil their bargain; and the latter were so generous, that they agreed to pay all the sum they had bargained for, but seventy thousand crowns, and gave hostages for the payment. Still a difficulty remained of the Florentines taking possession, which at last was removed by their breaking through the Pisan army; and no sooner were they masters of the city and citadel, than they relieved their hostages by paying the stipulated money.

and inwade the Pisan territories.

They are defeated.

THIS event gave infinite joy and spirits to the Florentines, who faw the Pisan camp from the walls of Lucca. The garrison was so strong, and the place so well provided with every thing, that the Pisan army must have returned home without any farther attempt, had not the Florentines within the city precipitately resolved to attack them in their en-This attack was made within eight days after trenchments. the Florentines became masters of Lucca. The Pisans were commanded by Giovanni Visconti, and Enrico, Castruccio's son, ferved under him; as did all the Florentine exiles, who formed the most considerable part of his army, which was drawn up in three lines, as that of the Florentines was in two. The first line of the latter consisted of two hundred chosen knights on horseback, supported by three thousand cross-bow men; and they made so surious a charge, that they drove the first line of the Pisans back upon their second, where they took prisoners Visconti the Pisan general, and Enrico, Castruccio's son, with several other persons of great quality; but the third line of the Pisans supporting the disordered troops of their two first lines, victory was fnatched from the Florentines, whose second line was so far from supporting their first, that they fled to Pescia without striking a stroke. The first line of the Florentines, being thus left exposed, suffered greatly, and victory declared herself in favour of the Pisans: the remains

mains of the first line however bravely fought their way back to Lucca.

THE loss the Florentines received in this defeat was far less than was at first reported at Florence. They remained in posfeffion of all their standards, and their illustrious prisoners; and the government, having recovered its first consternation, applied, by deputies, to Robert king of Sicily for protection, offering at the same time to submit, as usual, to any prince of his blood whom he should send as his governor or vice-109 at Florence. Robert received the deputies very coldly, and infifted upon the rendition of Lucca to him, as being his property, and torn from him by the treachery of Fagiclani. The Florentines had foreseen this demand, and they instructed their deputies to comply with it; but Robert, suspecting they would infift upon the payment of the money it had cost them, declined interesting himself farther than by sending an ambassador to disturde the Pisans from continuing the siege of Lucca, which he affirmed to be his property. The Pilans returned him good words, but continued the siege with greater vigour than ever.

THE Florentine affairs wearing thus a bad aspect, the people Their mibegan to suspect, perhaps without any grounds, that Peter ferable fi-Sace, the late lord of Arezzo, would feize that opportunity tuation, to reinstate himself in that government. Peter was then living in one of his castles in the country; and the Florentine magistracy, as if they had been convinced of their danger, ordered the people to take arms and to furround the place. The madness of popular jealousy did not stop here. Tarlati. brother to Peter, was then one of the most distinguished officers in the Florentine army; and it was chiefly by his means that the remains of their first line had made so noble a retreat, as they did, to Lucca. But his conduct being irreproachable, the people grew the more jealous of his credit in the army, and of the power he might thereby acquire to favour his brother. An order, therefore, was sent from Florence to put him under arrest at Lucca, which was obeyed without confining him to prison; and he was allowed to ride abroad in company with Giacomo Medici, the Florentine governor of One day, as they were reconnoitring on horseback without the gates, Tarlati put spurs to his horse, and fled to the Pisan camp. His escape confirmed the Florentines in their worst suspicions of Peter's designs; and after forcing him and all his relations to furrender themselves, they were brought to Florence, where they were committed to prison, while all their fine palaces in that city were demolished, and their castles in the country taken.

THE

and diftress.

THE Florentines being disappointed of affistance from the king of Naples, were advised by Scaliger to apply to the emperor Lewis, who was about this time at Trent, and who was greatly exasperated against the Pisans, as well as a mortal enemy to the pope and the king of Naples. this advice was plausible, and supported by a great party in Florence, yet the people were so prepossessed against the emperor, that no progress was made in the negotiation. Upon this the Florentines took two thousand horse into their pay, besides six hundred they hired of the Ferrarese, and five hundred of Scaliger, all which joined to their own troops made a formidable army; and they preferred Malatesta of Rimini, 2 celebrated general of those times, to the command of it. Early in the fpring he marched to the relief of Lucca, which continued still besieged by the Pisans; but the swelling of the rivers, and the badness of the roads by the rains, frustrated his expedition; and the Florentines were driven to their usual recourse of ravaging their enemy's country. Notwithstanding this the Pisans still continued the siege of Lucca, which being now reduced to the last extremity, the garrison capitulated to deliver up the place upon honourable terms for themfelves, in the ninth month of the fiege. This, according to Aretin2, is a shameful period in the Florentine history; and yet it is easy to account for, by reflecting upon the unreasonable jealousy the Florentines entertained of their nobles. This jealousy disqualified the nobles from the command of their armies, and led them to apply to the gainful arts of commerce, which feems, in fact, to have been their principal inducement to expend so much blood and treasure as they did, in acquiring and maintaining the possession of Lucca.

Their diwifions.

THEIR resentments at the loss of that city hurried them into far greater calamities, by inspiring them with animosities amongst themselves, each party blaming the other for its misconduct, and all of them disagreeing about the means of recovering from their distresses (D), though all of them agreed upon the fatal expedient of preferring Gualtieri, the titular duke of Athens, to be their general. He was by birth a Lombard; and having served in their sormer wars under Charles prince of Naples, was well acquainted with their difpositions, the nature of their government, and the state of which fixes the priority in point have been doubtful.

* ARETIN. pag. 138.

(D) Upon this occasion Ma- of time to the latter; a circumnetti quotes Aretin and his words, stance which otherwise might their parties. He was at Naples when the Florentines invited They chuse him to take upon him, not only the command of their army, the duke of but the government of their city. Their good opinion of Athens for him was greatly encreased by the modesty of his retinue when their stadthe entered their capital. It foon appeared how much they were bolder. deceived. That age abounded with foldiers of fortune; and Gualtieri was one who exected vast projects upon a very moderate share of abilities to support them. He had long portioned out the dominion of Florence to himself, and his ambition being now gratified in part, he studied how to make himself absolute, and to ingross the whole of the government. His history, and that of his new subjects, on this occasion is The state of Florence, like almost all other states, consisted of three kinds of people. The first were the nobles, who, by the constitution of the government, had been so long accustomed to the exercise of trade and other arts, that far from thinking it to be a difgrace to their nobility, they boafted of their industry, and began now to look upon wealth as the best nobility. Not only their fortunes, but their ideas, being raised above those of the vulgar, a kind of an antipathy subsisted between them, which was confirmed by the democratical nature of their government. The next class was the middling fort, who, with plain strong sense and great industry, had acquired moderate fortunes, and who, in a regular state, ought properly to be termed the people. These affected no public changes or revolutions, but those that were absolutely indispensable to the security of their property. The last class was the plebeians, who hated the first class, and envied the second.

GUALTIERI had fagacity enough to perceive that the fe- His tycond class would be the great obstacle to his ambition. The ranny and mobility had submitted to him, because they thought his power cruelty. was but temporary, and that they had at any time interest enough to displace him as soon as he had answered their end, in abolishing the democratical part of the constitution, which they had never ceased to consider as an invasion of their whis. Gualtieri admitted them so far into the secret of his conduct, as to acquaint them that he intended to bend the chief force of his power against the middling citizens, which would enable him more effectually to serve the nobility, but that he could not succeed without making himself extremely popular amongst the lower ranks, and that, however he proceeded, the nobility must appear neutral. The reader is here to observe that the Arezzians, the Volterrans, and the Pistoians, had followed the example of the Florentines in chuling Gualtieri for their stadtholder, which is the term that approaches nearest to his office. The titles he assumed west duke of Athens, lord of Pistoia, Arezzo, and Volterra. He governed Florence in person; but had his substitutes in the other three states.

GUALTIERI was sensible, that without peace abroad it must be impossible for him to succeed in his ambivious schemes at home. He was therefore no fooner formally invested with supreme power at Florence, than he made a most dishonourable peace with the Pisans, to whom he relinquished the posfession of Lucca for fifteen years, on their engaging to redeliver it to the Florentines at the expiration of that term. He pretended that the lituation of affairs rendered such a peace necessary, and that the misconduct of certain citizens in the purchase of Lucca, as well as in other transactions, ought to be punished with the utmost rigour. The citizens he hinted at were the most respectable in all the commonwealth: most of them were noble, but without the pride too often attached to that honour, and all of them devoted to the constitution of their country, by endeavouring to keep up a balance between the first and second classes of their fellow-citizens. At the head of these was Giacomo Medici, who had been lately governor of Lucca, and a principal agent in the Florentine purchase of that city. This nobleman lost his head; and it was with great difficulty that the friends of Oricella and Ricciardo Riccio, who stood in a still greater degree of popularity, prevailed with the tyrant not to put them to death likewise; but Altovita, another nobleman, shared the fate of Medici.

The Florentine presidents oppose the tyrant,

THE populace at first applauded those acts of cruelty as examples of justice, and adored Gualtieri as a man who had no respect of persons. The nobility, though they perceived themselves to be mistaken in their measures and connections with the tyrant, durst not oppose him; but the wisdom of the Florentine constitution appeared now in its full lustre. The presidents, whose authority in judicial cases never had been abolished, manfully withstood all the terrors of the tyrant. When he summoned the people to a general meeting, in order to take upon himself the absolute government, the prefidents privately told him that he had exceeded his powers. because, by their capitulation with him, none but they could iffue fuch fummonies. The tyrant's answer was, that he intended to give the people liberty to declare their sentiments. without which they could not be called free. After a good deal of altercation it was agreed, that next day, when the assembly was to be held, the presidents should move the government to be decreed to him for one year, under the fame limi-limitations that it had been yielded before to Robert prince of Naples. The tyrant, however, had taken his measures so who is well, that he was uthered into the affembly by some of the made lard principal nobility, and his person was guarded by a number of of Floplebeians, with arms concealed under their cloaths. One of rence. the prefidents rifing from his feat, made the motion agreed upon the night before; but he was interrupted by a general cry, that they would have Gualtieri for their governor without any limitations. The prefident: being thus deterred from farther opposition, the nobility carried the tyrant on their shoulders to the palace, where they placed him in the chair of state.

AREZZO and Pissoia continued still to be under the Florentines; but Gualtieri, under the plaufible pretence of abolishing that subjection, now received them under his own immediate dominion, and placed governors in both. He then and feizes made fome alterations in the difgraceful peace with the Pifans. Arezzo The terms were, that they should possess Lucca for fifteen years, and Pifand then restore it to its liberty; and that in the mean while toia. the Lucquese exiles should be restored, and the Florentine captives released; that the Florentines should keep the forts they had in the Lucquese territories, and that the Pisans should pay them annually nine thousand crowns; but that all the friends of the Pifans, who had been expelled from Florence, should be restored to their country and effects. To qualify those and some other shameful conditions a, it was agreed, that the Florentines should name the chief magistrate of Lucca during the fifteen years; but, as Aretin very justly observes, this was in reality next to nothing, as the Pisans were in possession of the citadel and the military power. The numbers of captive and other nobility which, by this peace, were restored to Florence, strengthened the tyrant's party, as they thought they owed their liberty to him. He then invited into his fervice all his countrymen who were in Tuscany, and out of them be formed a body-guard of about eight hundred horse. After that he entered into a league with the Pisans, the real intention of which was to bridle the Florentines.

HAVING proceeded thus far, he turned the presidents out His policy. of the palace allotted for them, and took possession of it himself. He was too prudent to abolish their office; but he left them only a shadow of its power. He totally abrogated the institutions of the companies and their gonfaloniers. He deprived their citizens ef their arms, and made himself the sole lountain of preferments and honours in the state. His ava-

ARETIN, pag. 140.

A. D. 1343. rice was infatiable: he appropriated all the public money to his own private use, and cancelled all pecuniary contracts that had been made by the public. The collectors and receivers of his taxes were all of them foreigners. Part of his great wealth he employed in fortifying his palace, so as to render it, to all intents and purposes, a citadel; and he was so shamefully neglectful of the public faith, that he suffered the hostages, who had been given to Scaliger, to be detained for non-payment of the money for which the state was engaged.

A conspiracy is formed against bim.

IT may feem furprifing how Gualtieri should succeed in this tyrannical proceeding with a people so quick-sighted, and so jealous of their power, as the Florentines were; but he was as artful as he was ambitious, and played off each party in Florence against the other, with so much dexterity, that he prevented their uniting in any common plan of opposition. His infolence and cruelty, however, got the better of his prudence. When any of the citizens complained of his officers, he ordered the complainants to be publicly whipped, without so much as enquiring into their grievances. He ordered a citizen's tongue to be pulled out by the roots; and having banished another upon suspicion, he seemingly pardoned him; but no sooner was he returned to Florence than he put him to death. At last despair and hatred got the better of fear amongst the Florentines. The tyrant feldom appeared abroad, and his guards always attended his own person. This gave the Florentines of all ranks opportunities of caballing against him; but the subject of their meeting being discovered to him by means of one Burneletti, a Florentine nobleman, several of the conspirators were seized, and, by the force of torments, discovered all they knew, before the other conspirators were aware that their plots were revealed. The depth of the conspiracy, and the quality and numbers of those concerned in it were so great, that the tyrant was aftonished, and at a loss how to proceed. His first care was to call into Florence troops from all the neighbouring garrisons: he then summoned to his palace three hundred of the principal citizens, all or most of whom were conspirators, with a design to strike off their heads, but under the pretence of taking their advice concerning the conspiracy. All those proceedings took up six days, and upon the seventh the citizens, instead of obeying the tyrant's summons, as one man, rose in arms. It then appeared that three several conspiracies had been formed, each without the knowledge of the other; but all now united against the tyrant. and, with what arms they could command, they belieged him in his palace or citadel. At first he endeavoured to make relistance:

essance; but finding them resolute, and that there was not all Florence a family that had not entered into a general impiracy, he proposed to treat. For this purpose he gave serty to all whom he had imprisoned on account of the contracy, and particularly to Antonio Adimari, one of the eatest men in Florence, and to the presidents, whom he smissed with unusual marks of regard, and tent from his lace the popular standards, as pledges of their recovered erties.

THE head of the conspirators was Angelo Acciaviali; and no He is lepular conspiracy was, perhaps, ever so regularly carried on. sieged and he citizens laughed at the tyrant's compliances and offers; exfelled. it, though they had no fettled authority to guide them, ey met in the great church, where they choic fourteen of icir number, the bishop being their principal, for resettling e government of the state. Notwithstanding this, the siege ent on with more fury than ever; and the tyrant, finding : last that he must yield, thrust out of the citadel those ficers and guards whose cruelty had rendered them most bnoxious to the people, by whom they were inflantly put to eath. Their punishments somewhat softened the fury of be beliegers; and the bishop, with his assessors, soon brought bem into such a temper, that, upon a parley. Gualtieri confermed to deliver up the citadel into the hands of the fourten, and to divest himself of all power over Florence. It wifely, at the same time, stipulated by the sourteen, that bould ratify those articles as soon as he quitted the F-orentine territories. All that he demanded in return was his life, which the fourteen with difficulty preferved, by keeping for two days within the castle, under a strong guard, kinding him off in the night-time to Cafantino, where ratified the articles. His tyranny over Florence continued one nine months. It is remarkable that the Arezzians, A Piloians, and the Volterrans, as if all had acted in conent, received their liberties, and expelled the tyrant's troops at the same time.

Though the Florentines had been beyond all example Difficulties minous in expelling their late tyrant, they were far and over-time being so as to the manner of resettling their govern-fights in the their govern-fights in the their city and state were at this time in the utmost resettling minimals. Their city and state were at this time in the utmost resettling minimals, nor could they be said to have any other matter Floresty than the source they had chosen. To them was retentine government the care of resettling the government. Upon deli-vernment. The problems who is made so glorious a stand against the late tyrant, should restored: thus far the government was to stand on its Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

old foundation. Something new, however, was proposed to be introduced, and that the nobility, who had been highly instrumental in expelling the tyrant, should, for that reason, as well as to prevent future differitions, which had been for fatal to the state, be capacitated to act as presidents, and in other posts of the magistracy. This innovation was likewife agreed to: no measures, however, were taken for refloring the courts of justice, and the institution of companies, it being alledged that such precautions were now rendered useless, by the nobility being consolidated with the commonalty in the government. The number of the city wards was reduced from fix to four; of which the Transarnine ward was one. When the general election of presidents came on, four were chosen from the nobility, and eight from the commonalty; and they took possession of the palace, and all the badges of authority they had been deprived of by the tyrant. All those regulations took place by the sole authority of the fourteen; but they were more specious than lasting, and though well meant, they were impracticable.

Céwil dissentions.

THE people, feeing four noblemen upon the bench of the prefidents, exclaimed against adding to a power that was even too formidable before; and to tell the truth, fays Aretin. they had some reason. Heats and animosities soon revived in Florence, where it was publicly faid, that by driving out one tyrant they had admitted hundreds. The bishop faw, that civil commotions were upon the point of again breaking out. Though he himself was of one of the noblest families. in Florence, he advised the fourteen to submit the modelling. of the state to an assembly of the people, as being the only means of retaining fomewhat, whereas by an obstinate perfeverance they might forfeit all. This moderate counsel was rejected with great acrimony, and some marks of contempt? for its author, whom they put in mind how scandalously. the plebeians had supported the late tyrant. The prelate, who was a man of resolution, retorted on the nobility their conduct on the same occasion; and words grew so high, that: they reached the ears of the people without doors, already ripe for an insurrection. In an instant they were in arms, broke into the palace, pulled the nobility from the bench of the presidents, and ordered them to return home in a private; station. This attack was what the nobles had so little forefeen, that they could that night come to no general resolution. Next day, the people resolved to lose no time, and attacked, one by one, all the houses of the nobility, situated in the Cifarnine Florence, which they easily reduced, but without offering any violence to their persons. The nobility be- The mobiling more powerful in the Transarnine Florence, the people lity expelfound more resistance there; at last they prevailed, and, led from though they had plundered and destroyed a few palaces where the magifthey had met with the greatest opposition, yet they treated tracy. the nobles and their families with becoming respect, declaring that they fought from motives neither of hatred nor revenge, but of love to their country, the constitution of which was dearer to them than themselves.

THE people's conquest over the nobility was glorious, The Flochiefly through the moderation with which they proceeded. rentines Their first care was to restore the ancient forms of their con-restore stitution, with some immaterial variations; and the chief Arezzo to posts in their government were bestowed on such plebeians its indeas affected the smallest pomp, and possessed the least power.

EVER fince they had had the dominion of Arezzo, they had been embroiled on its account, as Saco, its former master, was still powerful enough to maintain his pretensions. The Plerentines, therefore, with equal wisdom and magnanimity, came to a resolution of restoring to Arezzo its independency. For this purpose a solemn deputation was sent from Florence, to compliment the Arezzians upon having fo nobly recovered their liberty, and to present them with a public instrument, by which the Florentine people resigned for ever all title to any right of dominion over that city. The deputies executed their commission in the most solemn manner, and the prefent was received by the Arezzians with the utmost raptures of joy and gratitude. Soon after a confederacy was formed between the Perugians, the Siennese, the Arezzians, and the Florentines, who were placed at the head of it.

THE Florentines, on farther consultation, considered them- and make selves as being still in a state of war with the Pisans, because peace with they did not think themselves bound by the peace the tyrant Pisa. had made. As the Pisans, however, had concluded it upon the principles of good faith, the Florentines consented to renew it with very few alterations. All those and other less important transactions happened the same year the tyrant was expelled.

NEXT year the Florentines passed some very severe laws against their nobility, particularly, that such of them as were in foreign services should, on being summoned, repair to Severities Florence, on pain of forfeiting all their estates and effects. against the The motive of this law obviously was, lest those noblemen mobility. should acquire such power and interest abroad, as might enable them to disturb the peace of the state at home. About the

the same time another severe act passed against them: for a profecution was ordered against the governors of all forts and castles belonging to Florence, most of whom were nobles who had been appointed by the tyrant. History is filent as to the penalty inflicted upon them; but we are told that several, especially noblemen, were condemned on that account.

Gualtieri court of France.

dit.

In the mean while, the expelled tyrant was foliciting his folicits the cause at the court of France, where he represented the Florentines, and the treatment he had received, in the most odious colours, infifting upon being indemnified for all his losses out of the estates of the Florentines who were settled in that kingdom. His complaints were fo well received, that the latter fent advices of their danger to the magistracy of Florence, in the most affecting terms. This had no other effect on the Florentines, than to make them pass what we may call an act of attainder against the tyrant, and to publish a reward for any one who should bring in his head: at the fame time he was publicly executed in effigy, with the utmost marks of infamy and detestation. Those proceedings, however, did not prevent the Florentines from sending an ambassador to vindicate their conduct at the court of France. Soon after his departure ambaffadors came from the king of France, demanding restitution of what had been taken from the tyrant, to the amount of a prodigious sum. The Florentines received and treated them with all the respect due to their master; but exposed the cruelty, avarice, ambition, and oppressions of the tyrant with such strength of eloquence and evidence, that the ambassadors had nothing to reply-They then shewed them his act of abdication, which he had ratified at a place where he could be under no apprehenfions of danger. After their audience, the ambassadors were treated in the most elegant sumptuous manner.

This year the Florentine government surmounted a difficulty which in that age would, perhaps, have been unfurmountable by any other people. The flate had borrowed from its subjects a large sum of money, amounting, to the best of our calculation, to about fixty thousand pounds sterling. The low state of the public finances, at this time, did not admit of the government paying off the debt, yet the public credit Original of must be supported. As a middle way, every creditor had alof five per cent. the money itself being heaped up in the paper ere- fignments made to him, on the public revenue, at the rate form of a mount or bank (both which terms are still in use). Those affignments were transferable like our stocks, and negotiated in the fame manner, their value rifing or falling acto Aretin² (E), from whom we have this curious account. the Florentine stock was negotiated in the same manner as bargains are for any other mercantile commodity. Here we, perhaps, have the first rise of paper credit. We have in the note given Aretin's words, which, to those not acquainted with mercantile affairs, are not quite clear.

In the beginning of the following year, the Florentine people feem to have been fo much intoxicated with their prosperous fituation, that they forgot their usual moderation. Their historians exclaim against one law they then passed as being unjust, and against another as being ungrateful. By the former the clergy was abridged in all their privileges. latter was a kind of an act of resumption, which cancelled all grants that had been made by the public to citizens for their past services, by which many were obliged to return great part of their estates, to the ruin of their families.

THE same year is noted for an event not much to the ho- Great nour of England. The Florentine family of the Bardi were bankruptcy then the greatest bankers in Europe, and had partnerships on account in most trading nations. They had lent Edward III. king of Engof England, about seven hundred thousand crowns of gold, to land. affift him in his French wars; and his majesty not being punctual in his remittances, the Bardi became infolvent. As they were in such high credit, that there was scarce a samily in Florence that had not money in their hands, the calamity was general, and occasioned such distrusts between man and man, as amounted to a stagnation of public credit. It appeared, however, upon inspecting the bankrupts accounts, that the company owed about two hundred thousand crowns less than the king owed them.

To add to the misfortunes of the Florentines, they undertood that Philip, then king of France, had to far taken part

2 Ibid. pag. 146.

(E) Nominibus eorum, quibus debibatur, tributim descriptis anmi reditus e publico constituti sunt, quina singulis centenis. Quantitates vero ipfas in unum ceacervatas, a similitudine camulandi, valgo Montem vocavere; idque incivitate postea servatum. Quoties respublica indiget, cives tributa persolwunt: solutorum wero pensiones annuas tercipiunt. Hi · montes cumulation gaue pecuniar um bellis quidem crescunt: pace minuuntur, propterea quod, abutdante republica, disjolutio sit crebru atque perentios Quantitatum vero descriptarum & venditio est civibus inter se & permutatio, asque (ut in cateris mercimoniis) pro tempore, pro Spe, pro commodo, minuitur carum precium atque augescit. In emtorem cadem commoda, qua folutus ipfe percepturus erat, transferuntur.

A. D. 13455 with their late tyrant, that he had ordered all Florentines and their goods to be seized, who should be found fixty days, after the date of the order, within his kingdom. He was induced, no doubt, to this feverity by the vast support the Fhrentines had given to his enemy and rival the king of England.

A. D. 1346.

NEXT year a general famine prevailed all over Italy, and the Florentines were obliged to buy up vast stocks of grain in A famine. Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily, which were imported into Flo-Their humanity on this occasion was as signal as their providence; for they gave bread to incredible numbers of women, children, and poor people, who flocked to their city from the country and the neighbouring states, who had not been so provident. Their compassion for the poor extended fill farther; for they limited the cases and forms of arresting a poor debtor. All their precautions, however, could not hinder a pestilential disease from breaking out in the city, which is generally the consequence of famine, and of a place overstocked with numbers of strangers.

Charles of Luxemburg chosen emperor.

DURING this year the Florentines received a fresh mortification, by their hereditary enemy Charles of Luxemburg, fon to John king of Bohemia, and grandson to the emperor Henry, being raised to the imperial dignity. This elevation, however, had no immediate ill consequence to the Florentines, who about this time acquired the fovereignty of the town of St. Miniato, which was delivered to them through the irreconcileable diffentions that reigned in the place. Famine and pestilence still prevailed all over Italy, in the Florentine territories especially, which were this year visited by a new guest, Lewis, grandson to Robert king of Naples, their ancient friend and protector. It is not our intention to enter here into a description of this prince and his family's fortunes, which may be found in other parts of this work. The Florentines resolved not to intermeddle in the dispute between him and the king of Hungary, who had driven him out of Naples, and forbad his entering into their city. This year it is faid, that no fewer than fixty thousand Florentines died; many of whom being men of the first rank in the state, there was for some time an almost total cessation of public business. All that the Florentines could do, was to repress the incursions of some robbers, who came from the Appennines to make their advantage of the public diffresses. Next year passed in almost the same inactivity, only the people of Colle and Gemiani submitted to the Florentines, their former masters, being impelled thereto by their domestic diffentions. Some strong places belonging to the Ubaldi, which sheltered robbers upon the Appennines, were likewise taken.

THE

THE year 1350 produced great events in Florence. Gionemai Visconti was then bishop and master of Milan, and the most powerful prince then in Lombardy, having added Boherne to his other dominions. The Florentines, alarmed by the neighbourhood of so powerful and arbitrary a prince. consulted how to oppose him if he should attempt to extend his territories, and for that purpose planned an alliance with Scalifer, and the other Tuscan states, who were equally jealous of his power, and, amongst others, the pope himself. A general meeting of deputies from all the confederates was held at Arezzo, where the pope's legate likewise assisted:

fon and successor from the confederacy, as he did several others who had been invited into it, and made them his friends. All this while he affected to keep a good corressondence with Florence; and, that he might disguise his true A. D. 1350.

but, Scaliger's death and many difficulties intervening, the negotiations came to nothing. Visconti, to avail himself of a Visconti's juncture so favourable to his ambition, detached Scaliger's artifice.

designs, he ordered his general Barnabo to besiege Imola, a frong city in the Romagna, his army then lying at Bologna. Amongst his troops were many of the Bolognese, and others, who were over-awed or suspected by him, particularly the inhabitants of Faenza and Friuli, whom he obliged to serve in his army, lest they might excite commotions against him in his Mence. The troops, however, he chiefly depended upon were three thousand horse and four thousand soot, chiefly mercenaries, headed by Barnabo. The garrison of Imola made a vigorous defence, so that he was obliged to turn the siege into a kind of blockade. While this lasted the Florentines had intelligence that the Pisans were about to declare for Visconti, and that he was concerting measures for making himself mas-ar of Pistoia and Prato. The last is a small city, but in The Flothose days well fortified, and of all others of the greatest rentines importance to the Florentines, because of its neighbourhood fecure b Florence. They knew that the inhabitants were torn into Prato, actions, which was the great encouragement Visconti had; and they resolved, if possible, to be before-hand with him. After a short consultation, a large body of troops were inantly in arms, and they marched to Prato with the greatest but regularity, and pitched their tents before the town, without offering the smallest hostility. The Pratonese were equally surprised by their friendly, as they had been by. their hostile appearance; and the Florentines reasoned with them so mildly, but effectually, that, opening their gates,

they received them as their protectors.

and Piltoia,

THIS important and unexpected success determined the Florentines next to attempt Pistoia, a city of much greater power and strength, likewise in the neighbourhood of Florence. A sedition that had lately happened there, gave the Florentines a pretext for offering its magistrates a body of troops for preferving the peace of their city. The offer was accepted of; but a very few of the Florentines were introduced into Pistoia, and these were bound by an oath of fidelity to the magistracy. Their numbers were one hundred horse, and one hundred and The Florentines, despairing thereby to gain their fifty foot. ends, refolved, if they could, to surprise their countrymen by a masterly exploit. They privately sent for the exiles, who had been driven from Pistoia in the late insurrection; and it was agreed, that they should surprise that city in the night-time by a scalade; and that one Peter, who was a commissary of the Florentine army, should be sent before to dispose the Florentines there to favour the attempt. Peter never discharged this commission. The exiles, however, thinking themselves fure of the Florentines within, performed their part with the utmost intrepidity; but after the greatest part of them had got over the wall, the Pistoians took the alarm, and a fierce encounter enfued, which was manfully fustained by the exiles, in a fure confidence of their being joined by the Florentine part of the garrison. The latter, however, knowing nothing of the conspiracy, sought as bravely against them as the Pissoians did; and, at last, the exiles were obliged to retreat by the same way they came in. The Pistoians, at first, imagined the attempt to be the act of their own exiles; but coming to the truth, by examining their prisoners, they became doubly intent upon guarding their city and liberty: but, though they were exasperated to the highest degree, they gave an honourable dismission to the Florentine part of their garrifon, on account of their fidelity and courage.

after fome failure of fuccess.

IT was perhaps this failure of success, chiefly, that opened the mouths of the Florentines against their presidents, as if they had by their treachery rendered the Pistoians, a people remarkably brave and resolute, their enemies; and had, as it were, driven them into the arms of Visconti. The wiser amongst the Florentines, however, reflecting that there was now no hopes of gaining over the Pistoians by fair means, counselled the people to lay asside all animosities, and to attempt to gain their point by force. This counsel was approved of, and in three days time Pistoia was besieged by sisteen thousand Florentines; a prodigious number, when we consider the havock of the late pestilence. The Pistoians prepared to make a brave desence; but the Florentines shewed such reluctime at hostilities, that daily conserences passed between the tenegers and the belieged. At last all difficulties were got over, by means of the triends the Florentines had in Pistoia, and the Pistoians unanimously received a Florentine garrison.

BEFORE this event, Visconti and his chief officers had al-Visconti ways mentioned the Florentines in terms of great respect and sends an friendship; but he now summoned together his friends all over army into Tuscany and Lombardy. He acquainted them, that he had Tuscany; discovered a conspiracy that had been formed by some Bolognesses lords, for betraying that city to the Florentines, whom he inveighed against with great bitterness. He then made a kind of a deduction of all that their several countries had suffered from the Florentines, and told them, that their only way to have reparation and revenge was for every state to exert itself all at once to fall upon them, and that he himself would lead them the way. His speech was received with vast applause, a great army was affembled, and the command of it given by him to Olegiano, one of his relations. His expedition was so great, that he passed the Appennines, and encamped near Pistoia, before his march from Bologna was heard of. All that the Florentines, under their great astonishment, could do, was to throw a strong reinforcement of horse and foot into the city, and to fend a deputation to expostulate with Olegiano. His answer was, that he was come, by order of the bishop of Milan, to obtain fatisfaction for the losses and outrages his friends and allies had received from the Florentine people; and that they must either take him for their arbiter, or expect the consequences. The deputies upon this left the camp, and he made dispositions for besieging Pistoia. His real in-which betention, however, was to excite a revolt within the city in his fieges Piffavour; but being disappointed of that hope, and finding the toia, and garrison prepared for a vigorous resistance, he broke up the marches fiege, and marched directly through the Pratonese towards against Florence. His army, according to Aretin b, consisted of above in main ten thousand horse and six thousand foot, besides a great number of auxiliary troops and volunteers. It foon appeared, that Olegiano, as he had done at Pistoia, depended more upon the Florentine diffensions than upon his own army, for the reduction of the city. All he did was taking a few inconsidetable places, and ravaging the open country; for after his troops had paraded for some time before Florence, he drew them off towards the vale of Mugelli. Upon this the Florentines Siege of threw a reinforcement into Scarperia, a garrifoned place they Scarperia.

had there, and a town now famous for its cutlery ware. Tho

this place was not fortified round, yet the inhabitants and the garrison baffled all the attempts of their enemies, and made an incredible defence.

This unfuccessful expedition of Visconti against the Flo-

Continuawar.

tion of the rentines occasioned commotions all over Lombardy and Tuf-Sace made an irruption upon the towns of the Upper Arno, and attempted to take Varico. He was opposed by the people of those parts, and by three hundred Florentine horse, with some Arezzians, under the command of Ricasolani, who immediately prepared to fight Saco. The latter stood upon the defensive; and Ricasolani, knowing his troops were but raw, forbore to attack him, so that Saco in the night drew off his army. Ricafolani, after this, though the Arezzians had left him, took Agnani. Visconti, all this while, was not idle: he sent an ambassador to persuade the Pisans to break off their league with the Florentines, in which case he promised to affift them with a strong body of troops under Barnabo. Gambdeurti were then the most powerful family in Pifa. friends to the Florentines, and no strangers to Visconti's ambi-By their advice and influence, his ambassadors were dismissed, without any other reply, than that the Pifans would fend their answer by deputies of their own. Visconti. finding he was trifled with, fent other ambassadors to Pifa with more splendid retinues, and with instructions to address the people in a general affembly. Their discourse was artful. and adapted to the innate hatred the lower ranks of Pisa had against the Florentines. But Francesino Gambacurti, the head of that family, in a very fine speech, shewed that the ruin of Florence would be but a prelude to that of Pifa. When he finished, the question was put, and it was unanimously carried, that the peace with Florence should be inviolably preferved on the part of Pisa.

Visconti baffled at Pila.

The Florentines augment

THE Florentines, perceiving the practices of Visconti, increased their domestic forces; and took into their pay two thousand five hundred German horse, who were joined by their army, two hundred Siennese, and six hundred Perugian cavalry was hourly expected. The garrison of Scarperia still continued to hold bravely out, and the Florentines had resolved to employ all their power to raise the siege, when Saco deseated the Perugians, as they were marching to join their allies. Arezzians, therefore, were obliged to detach themselves from the main army, and to return home, that they might baffle any attempts that might be made against them. defeat obliged the Florentines to alter their measures, and damped the Scarperians, who were now reduced to the greatest distress. Vicedomini, a Florentine nobleman of great spirit, to

La generous example to his countrymen, broke through the beliegers camp in the night-time, and entered Scarperia with thirty horse. This was but a feeble reinforcement; and Medici, a Florentine of great courage, taking advantage of a flormy night, entered the enemy's camp, where it was weakeff, with one hundred horse, and, with the loss of twenty, he carried the rest sase into the town. Those reinforcements, though but inconsiderable, gave such spirit to the besieged, and raise that they baffled the most vigorous attempts of their enemies the fiege of with unparalleled courage and perseverance; so that the be-Scarperia: siegers were at last obliged to repass the Appennines, and return to the Bolognese.

THE Florentines made noble acknowledgments for the their genefervices performed them on this occasion. They doubled the rofity. pay of every common foldier of the garrison; they freed the townsmen from the payment of all taxes for ten years; they presented John and his brother Silvester Medici, who were honoured with knighthood, with five hundred crowns of gold each, to be expended on their arms and equipages, and one hundred and fifty for their table: but some noblemen, who had likewise signalized themselves, particularly the Donati, the Ruffi, and the Vicedomini, were misrepresented to the people.

ABOUT this time the family of the Brandali, then the most powerful in Arezzo, entered into a correspondence with Visconti, and some other of their discontented countrymen, for seizing that city. One of the conspirators happened to be appointed to the custody of a tower, that commanded a gate leading into the country, which gave their fellow conspirators an affurance of success that they could not dissemble. As the magistrates were examining those they suspected, Visconti's Arezzo troops appeared before the gate, and the conspirators stood to preserved.

their arms within the city. The Arezzians, however, attacked their foreign enemies, who were in number fix hundred foot and three hundred horse, so resolutely, that they obliged them to retreat, and give over their attempt. tower and the houses of the conspirators continued, nevertheless, to make a resolute defence; and, after three days assault, it was agreed, that the conspirators should depart safe out of Arezzo. Saco, however, about the same time, succeeded in surprising Burgo, a town of some consequence belonging to the Perugians; and the town of Anglari, belonging to them, furrendered to him likewise.

IT now drew towards winter, and it was agreed amongst The Tusthe consederate states of Tuscany, who were the Florentines, can confethe Arezzians, the Perugians, and the Siennese, that they deracy re-Thould newed.

should make the most vigorous preparations for continuing the war next year. The Florentine magistrates, on this occasion, are severely reprehended by their historian c, for dismissing their mative troops, and taking a body of foreigners into their pay. The confederates fent deputies to Avignon, where the pope then resided, to invite him into the confederacy against Viscenti; but they returned fraught with promises, and nothing else. During those transactions, Scarperia, which had been so. bravely defended, was surprised by a party of Visconti's troops, who had been encouraged to the attempt by the diffentions fublishing between the townsmen and the garrison; but the latter, forgetting all animolities, foon recovered the place, and drove the enemy out. During the same winter, Saco, having ravaged the Perugian territories, obliged, or engaged, the people of Cortona to declare for Visconti,

Negotiathe emperor,

IT was now known at Florence that the pope and the French tions with court had been prevailed upon, by Visconti, not to intermeddle in the affairs of Tuscany; so that the confederates were obliged to throw their eyes for affiltance towards a power, whom they had some time before considered as their capital enemy: this was the emperor Charles IV. He had no reason to be well fatisfied with the Visconti family; and upon the confederates fecretly applying to him, he agreed to fend a private agent to Florence, to concert measures for their relief. About this time the Florentines believed, but in vain, the fort of Vertina, a castle held by some exiles, chiefly of the Ricesolani family; and Ruffo, the Florentine governor of the valley of Mugelli, failed in an attempt to relieve the castle of Lozola, besieged by the Ubaldini: for this he was dismissed from his command, which was given to another, who relieved the place, and beat the enemy.

, and the confiderates.

THE Florentine deputies now renewed their folicitations at pope, who Avignon, as their last effort with the pope, who, far from outwits the complying, prevailed upon them to agree to his mediating a peace between Visconti and the emperor; and the former being excommunicated, his holiness took off from him all the ecclesiastical censures, and even remitted to him the posfession of Bologna for twelve months; and all this in consideration of a vast sum of money paid him by Visconti. This done, all further talk of a peace vanished; by which the Florentines plainly faw that they had been deceived and overreached by his holinefs. As they themselves had been partly accessary to their own disappointment, they were almost ashamed to complain; but they rejected a truce for a year, proposed by the pope, between them and Visconti. The confederates then renewed their applications to Charles; and, after various negociations, it was agreed, that he should march to their affistance with an army against Visconti, upon their paying him a subsidy, and acknowledging him to be the head of the Roman empire. The exiles in the castle of Vertina. who had before baffled the attempts of the Florentines, were now obliged to jurrender upon a capitulation, and the place was levelled to the ground. During the fummer of this year the Florentines profecuted the war against Saco, whose estates they ravaged, and then defeated him in a pitched battle.

To counterballance those advantages, the allies of Visconti took some places in the Perugian territories; but the Perugians receiving a seasonable reinforcement of eight hundred horse from Florence, compleatly deteated their enemies, and retook the places. The Arezzians were not so successful: they distrusted all affishance offered them by the Florentines, and their territories were plundered by their enemies, especially by Saw. A great number of other flying actions happened the same year, of little importance, and endless to recount.

DURING those transactions, the reputation of the Florenline government gained ground. Viscont: faw he had been milinformed; and that the riches brought them by foreign commerce were inexhaustible, and would always enable them to maintain powerful armies in the field. Add to all this, he was now infirm in his health, and had left all hopes of gaining the Pifans: he therefore applied to Francoing Gambacarti, his former opposer at Pifa, to mediate a neace between him and the confederates. That nobleman readily undertook the office, and the Florentines as readily embraced the evoporal. Deputies from all parts met at Screzana; and, after great al- Terms of tercations, it was agreed, that a peace should be concluded peace bebetween the Florentines and their confederates, on the one part; tween the and the bishop of Milm, his adherents, and dependents, on Florenthe other; that the bishop should withdraw all his troops and times and garrisons from Tufcany, and never after make war upon any of Visconia. the Tuscan states; that he should restore all he had taken from the Pistoians, and leave Burgo to its ancient freedom. If the Plorentines should attack the Pifinis or the Lucquite, the prelate might fend them affitance; and the Fiorentines had the Yame liberty, if either of those states should be attacked by the prelate. All the Florestine and Perugian exiles, on account of the late war, were to be reflored; but no other, unless expressly named in the treaty. Saco and his family were to be reftored to all their perfessions in the in valuan territory;

put

but none of them were to come nearer than the distance of four miles to that city 4. Such were the general terms of this treaty, which contained a great many other articles and precautions, with regard to the exiles. According to Manetti e, the terms of this peace were inviolably kept on both fides, till the time of Visconti's death, which happened a few years after.

False mused.

So honourable a peace gave the Florentines now some reters punish- spite to look into their domestic concerns. Their first inquiry was into the state of their army, where they found the most scandalous abuses had been committed by their commissaries, and others, who had made false musters. Some of the delinquents were brought to condign punishment; and the Florentines honourably discharged all mercenaries from their service, and intirely betook themselves to the arts of peace, which they were allowed to cultivate only for a few months.

Original of the Florentine war with the German *ban*ditti.

THE discharge of the foreign mercenaries, though a meafure wife and equitable in itself, brought great troubles upon all the Tuscan states. Most of the mercenaries finding now no employment in Italy, and confishing of outlaws from Germany, France, and other nations, united themselves under the command of one Moriali, a Frenchman, or a Lombard, (for the Tuscan historians use the same name for both) and resolved to lay all Italy under contribution. They were foon joined by many Italians, and their numbers amounted to above eight thousand horse and four thousand foot, all of them regular veteran troops, besides an immense number of servants and attendants upon their camp. They set out upon the principle of rapine; but each state was at liberty to redeem itself from their ravages, upon paying the contributions at which they were taxed. After ravaging some parts of Italy, they passed the Appennines, and invaded the territory of Perugia, which was obliged to pay them the contributions they demanded. The Florentines in vain endeavoured to form a confederacy against them; for the banditti, as they were called, came within eight miles of Florence; and the Florentines, as well as the Siennese, were obliged to satisfy their lawless demands. They met with the same success at Arezzo, and at Citta di Castello, where they divided their plunder; and about the beginning of October they went into winter-quarters, whereever they could make them good.

ABOUT this time the Genoese, who had for some time the emperor maintained an unequal war with the Venetians, and other Charles.

d ARET. p. 162. * MANETTI ubi supra, pag. 1065.

memies, submitted themselves to the protection of Visconti, and put him in possession of their city. Upon this the Venetions, the Paduans, the Veronese, and the Ferrarese, with all Visconti's ancient enemies, applied to the emperor Charles, who at their request entered Italy; but stopt at Padua, till he should see what turn affairs should take. In this critical conjuncture Visconti died, and was succeeded in his dominions by his brother's children. Their unanimity was so great, that Charles, despairing of any revolution in his favour, brought about a truce between the Milanese and their enemies; and, after remaining some days at Milan, he marched to Pisa, and was admitted into that city. While he remained there, the Florentines, the Siennese, and Arezzians, sent him a joint deputation; but it soon appeared that the Siennese had separate views, and intended to put themselves under the emperor's The people of Volterra and Miniato, without the knowledge of their allies the Florentines, surrendered themselves and their territories to Charles; and at last it was found, that the Florentines and the Arezzians were the only flates who remained firm in the principles of their confederacy. On the other hand, Saco and Fagiolani complained to the emperor of the hardship of the terms imposed upon them by the treaty of Serazana; but Charles, whose great aim was to get money, gave no fatisfaction to either party, though he seemed rather to incline to the cause of the Arezzians. Florentines applied to him with better success; and, by the affiliance of a round fum of money, obtained all they requested. From Pisa, Charles marched to Volterra, and from thence to Miniato, and was received in both places. From thence he went to Sienna, where he was likewise received, but not without opposition. The Florentines at this time were, of all the Italian states, his favourites, for having, by a prudent compliance, furnished him with money, which carned him to Rome, where, with his empress, he was solemnly

ABOUT the beginning of the year 1355, Charles set out Death of from Rome for Germany, and, passing through Tuscany, he in- Saco. dulged the Florentines and their allies in all their demands; for which he is blamed by the German historians, as having bartered all the imperial demesses in Italy for money. year the Florentines fortified Cassiano, which had proved a retreat for the banditti, who, during the emperor's abode in Italy, seemed to have been pretty quiet. About this time Saco, formerly lord of Arezzo, died, aged above eighty years, which he, almost without interruption, spent in the field. The day of his death was celebrated by the Florentines as that Jo of their deliverance. The terrors of the banditti were again. renewed, and the Florentines fortified some other places against them. But other dangers threatened the state. The emperor, in all his proceedings, had declared himself a Guelph; and that faction at Florence had power enough to carry an act against any Gibelin, or the descendant of one, holding any place of trust or profit in the state. This renewed all the public distractions there, and fresh acts passed to strengthen the power of the plebeians.

The Flostaple removed to Telamone.

ABOUT this time the Florentines, whose trade was now rentine arrived at a prodigious height, finding that the Pisans wanted to extort unreasonably for the liberty of landing goods in their ports, ordered their merchants to land them at Telamone, now a small fortified town in the State de gli Presidii. The Pisans, perceiving that they were deprived of that valuable intercourse, gave frequent interruptions to the Florentine traders. who were obliged to carry their commodities by a long landcarriage to Florence. But the Florentines, with a spirit becoming a free people, refolved not to be braved by the Pisans, even at sea; and hired of the Provençals fifteen ships of war, with which they not only protected their own trade, but carried terror to Pisa itself.

Progress of THE terror of the German banditti still hung over the ti, the bandit- heads of the Florentines. They now again appeared in the kingdom of Naples: from thence they proceeded to Lombardy; and, after ravaging the Milanese, they marched to the Bolognese, from whence they endeavoured to penetrate into the Florentine territories; but the Florentines had taken care to fortify the passes of the Appennines so well, that they found it impracticable to proceed. Upon this they promised to retire towards their own country, without scarcely touching on the Florentine grounds, by the Cafantin. The Florentines either could not, or would not, oppose this proposal; but, after they had entered upon the mountains, the country people, who had fuffered fo greatly by their depredations, fell upon the fecond division of them so furiously, with stones from the tops of the rocks, which every way furrounded them, that most subom are of them were killed, without being able to make the smallest refistance; and all their booty fell into the hands of their conquerors, many of whom were women, who shared equally with the men in their spoils. As to the first division of the robbers, they reached Decumani, a small village belonging to the Florentines, carrying along with them the Florentine deputies, who had agreed to their march, and whom they threatened with destruction, as soon as they heard of the total discomfiture of their companions. Nothing could have saved them, destroyed.

men, had not the robbers been here surrounded in the same anner as their companions had been by the country people, wally intent upon revenge and plunder. The deputies inposed, and by saving the robbers from their rage, they red themselves, though with great difficulty, and without ing thanked by either party. The country people were asperated at being disappointed of their prey, and the banti upbraided the Florentines with breach of faith.

ABOUT this time the Florentines effected an accommoda-Their force in between the Perugians and the Siennese, and obliged both increased.

rties to fland to their award. The overthrow of one part the banditti served but to inspire the other with thoughts vengeance; and their rage was increased by Com ade Lyndo. eir general, a German soldier of fortune. He had been iken prisoner, and stript of his all, when their second division ras deffroyed; but, finding means to escape, he now renined his followers. The late peace between the Siennese and be Perugians, added three thousand German house, who were then dismissed, to the banditti. By this junction they were formidable, that they resolved no longer to hazard themlettes in mountainous marches, but to force their way through the champaign country into Tuscany, which they proposed to made by the way of Perugia, to fave them the danger of puting the Appennines. The vast circuit which this obliged them to take was of little inconvenience to men who lived by thinder, and who were marching through the finest countries n Europe. They met with no interruption on their march, and before they arrived at Perugia, the inhabitants fent deputies, who paid them a sum of money for the indemnification of their city; and their example was followed by the Siennese ad the Pijans. Thus the fairest and most populous provinces lish were laid under contribution by a set of lawless russians, horror in which they were held. Wherever they met with Les relistance, ruin to the inhabitants was the certain conspence: they demolished towns, desolated countries, slaughreal people, and nothing but money could buy off their ravages.

It was upon this occasion that the wisdom and magnani-Magnaniwos the Florentines shone out with a lustre equal to that of mity of the reatest states of antiquity. Instead of being intimidated the Florenthe example of their neighbours, or the numbers of the ines.

de la liteir force, and declared that Florence was the only Mon. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

object they had in their eye when they undertook their long march, and that she was to expect no favour. The most respectable citizens of the Florentine allies came to Florence, to persuade the people and magistrates that they had no way to avoid certain destruction, but to send deputies to treat with the ruffians; and that they might buy their peace cheaper than their quarters for a fingle day in their territories would cost their state. Those and many other specious arguments were disdained by the Florentines, who continued their warlike preparations, and chose Pandolfo Malatesta for their general. Instead of waiting within their walls, Malatesta led his troops to the field against the banditti, and arrived at the Pefa just at the time when they had begun to march from Sienna towards Florence with their full force. But when, contrary to their expectations, they understood that the Florentines had even imposed filence upon all advocates for an accommodation with them, and were waiting for them in order of battle, they were startled; and, after loitering for some time in the Siennese, they turned off towards the Volterran, from thence to proceed to Pisa. The Florentine army followed them; and passing the Alfa at St. Miniato, they again offered battle to the banditti, who declined it, and marched off towards the Lucquese. They were pursued by the Florentines; and now it appeared, that no true courage can animate a lawless set of men; for the banditti still continued retreating.

Admired

THE attention of all Italy had for some time been emby all Italy, ployed upon the firm conduct of the Florentines, and it now became their admiration. The most distant states interested themselves in the fate and support of so much magnanimity, and wanted to share in the glory. The king of Sicily, Barnabo duke of Milan, the Paduans, and the Ferrarefe, sent troops to serve in the Florentine army. Those of Barnabo were headed by his fon Ambrosini. The Arezzians sent them two hundred horse, and as many foot, all of them picked troops; and fifty of the greatest Neapolitan nobility served 2 volunteers in the campaign. The Germans, at last, drew up upon a high ground, where they thought it was impracticable for the Florentines to affault them; but while dispositions for attacking them next day were making, the banditti fet fire to their camp in their night, and drew off with vast precipitation towards Lucca, from whence they fled into the Genoese territories in their march towards the dutchy of Monferrat.

I be banditti repulsed. Reflection.

Thus ended, to the immortal honour of Florence, a danger that threatened great calamity to her state. It is probable, that had the banditti prevailed against Florence, a new kingdom, such as that of the Lombards, would have been erected in Italy; and nothing but their want of a proper head, and time other colour to their cause than that of mere robbery, could have prevented their fuccess. All Europe was then full of foldiers of fortune, who, in time of peace, had no means of subsisting but by rapine and plunder, as we shall soon have an opportunity of thewing more at large.

THE Florentine general and his army, upon their return Tree banfrom the campaign, made a triumphal entry into Florence, ditti inwhere handsome presents were bestowed upon all the auxiliary wash Patroops; and never did the Florentine name appear with greater via. luttre, nor their state with more authority, than they did on that occasion. Perhaps their general was a little too delicate, in point of form, when he refused to pursue the banditti into the Lucquese, for fear of violating the peace with the Pilans, who then held Lucca. Soon after the army's return to Floreace, intelligence came that the banditti had made their appearance near Pavia, then belonging to Barnabo. Upon this the Florentines immediately ordered a detachment of one thouand horse to Barnabo's assistance.

Bur the banditti-war was not the only war this year car-Biblianna tied on by the Florentines. The Ubertini and Tarket continue to med still to be leading families in the Arezzian state; and the the therenchief of the Ubertini had served the Florentines against the times. This ingrapanditti, and had lost his son in the campaign. tated his family so much with the Florentines, that they gave the youth a most magnificent public burial, and bestowed the bonour of knighthood on his furviving brother. Great animolities subfifting between the two families, the Ubertini perfinded the Florentines to declare war against Biblionna, then a trong place in the Cafantine, held by the Tarluti, but now an open market town. The fiege continued for two months; but be place was at last taken, and delivered up to the Florentines. reduction was followed by the furrender of the neighbouring forts held by the Tarlati, (of whom Saco, whole memory vis so obnoxious to the Florentines, had been the head) which we given to the Arezzians, and his two fons carried prisoners b Florence.

NEXT year, differences broke out between Barnabo and War in the Okziano, Visconti's nephews and successors; and Okziano found Beleghinself obliged to make a surrender of Balagna to the pope's ness. egate. Upon this Barnabo marched an army into the Bulgnese, to dispute his taking possession of it. A desperate war enfued; in which, notwithstanding the recent connections between the Florentines and Barnalo, the former could not help wishing success to the legate, as being the less forsidable neighbour. This war, however, did not divert their

in Flo-

rence.

who had been long first minister to the king and kingdom of Naples, and a man of great power and abilities, had for some time resided in Florence, on the part of the legate; and had acquired so much authority there, that the people imagined he aspired to a seat in their magistracy. Upon this suspicion Law passed they passed a law, that no man could be a magistrate of Flarence, who was the governor of, or held a post in any other Next year Volterra was reduced to the obedience of the Florentines, through the diffentions of its own citizens. By this time, thro' the removal of the Florentine staple to Telamone, the Pisan state was rendered almost a desart, and their ports abandoned. They had, from time to time, interrupted the Florentine navigation into Telamone; and such heart-burnings arose between the two states, that it was plain an open breach must be the consequence; a colourable pretext now being only wanting, which foon presented itself. The castle of Petrabona, belonging to the Pilans, had been leized by fome private persons, and was now besieged by their former masters. Pietro Gambacurta, being then an exile from Pifa, lived at Florence; from whence he made several incursions, at the head of his own followers, into the Pifan territory. His being protected by the Florentines, gave the Pisans a pretext for entering upon hostilities; and the Florentines undertook to raise the siege of Petrabona, which, however, was taken by the Pisans in their fight. THE Florentines looked upon this event as a difgrace to their arms, and in a few days after fell into the Pifan territory with a great army, in which were eight hundred horse and four thousand foot, all of them mercenaries. They encamped near Pacciole, and reduced most of the neighbouring garrisons. Their general in this expedition was Bonifacio Lupo of Parma, who, being a regular bred foldier, feldom deigned to confult with the Florentine prefidents, who always attended their generals in the nature of field-deputies, or any of the other Florentines. This haughtiness rendered him disagreeable to the state, and Rodolfo Varanio of Camerino took his command. The new general instantly led his troops to the walls of Pifa, and having forced his enemy's lines, which they thought impregnable, he found himself in an open plentiful country. Having wasted or burned all in the neighbourhood of Pifa, he intercepted letters from Paccisle, directed to the Pisan government, informing it of the weakness of the place, on account of the flower of the garrifon and inhabitants having marched to plunder the territory of Volterra, and begging for a reinforcement. Varanio, upon this, marched directly to Pacciols, and arrived time enough to make such a disposition of ops as to cut off the return of marauders to the town, was reduced to fuch streights, that it was agreed, by a Pacciole lation, the place should be given up, if it was not suc- taken by by a certain day. The commandant of the citadel the Florento agree to this capitulation; but a large breach being tines. in the walls, the Florentines entered the place sword in in hopes of having the plunder of it. But upon the nen, who had made the capitulation, throwing themupon their knees before Varanio and the Florentine preand laying the whole blame of the refistance upon the andant, they were saved from plunder. This act of affion ruined the authority of Varanio in the army, espewith the mercenaries; and though he took a few more in the neighbourhood, yet two thousand horse deserted him; and he was at last obliged to resign his command tre Farnetio, who was esteemed one of the best officers vent on briskly by sea. The former had hired two great rentines from the Genoese, commanded by Perino Grimaldi, and enter the thers were sent them from the kingdom of Naples, port of the credit of Acciaioli. Those four great vessels, as Pisarere in those days thought, proved an overmatch for all isam marine. They made descents all along the enecoasts, where they took some places of strength and impose; and at last they even entered the harbour of Pisa, eaking through the great iron chain which secured it, which, carrying it off with them, they hung up in the old e of Mars at Florence, as a trophy of their maritime, where it is said to hang to this day.

War with Pifa.

RLY in the spring, after Farnetio received his command, Exploits tempted to surprise Lucca, but miscarried; and five hun- and death Florentines were deseated by their enemies in the neigh- of Farne-100d of Barga, then besieged by the Pisans. Those tio. is served only to excite Farnetio to do something that t more than counterballance them. He entered the territory, and came to a general engagement with their of force; in which he gave his enemies a total deseat, by g prisoner their general, with a great number of their rs, and almost all their military ensigns, which he carback in great triumph to Florence. His modesty was I to his glory. The Florentines, who, in all affairs of mment and war, affected to imitate the Roman repubasion a full assembly offered him a crown of laurel; but he refused it, as being too great an honour, till he could perform some service of greater consequence to the state.

Soon after this, Farnetic again invaded the Pisan territory, and skirmished with his enemies at their very gates. know not, however, that he made any dispositions for besieging the city: but it is certain, that, instead of celebrating, as wan the custom of the Italians in those days, affrontive abusive games before the places they could not take, he struck under the walls of Pija some coins, which carried his own device. that of a fox couchant b. His successes delivered Barga from the long fiege it had fustained; for no sooner were they made known to the belieged, by a detachment of horse thrown into it by Farnetio, than the garrison made so brisk a fally, that they drove their enemies out of their entrenchments, and forced them to abandon the fiege. The Pisans must now have submitted to whatever terms the Florentines had pleased to impose upon them, had it not been for two events. first was the death of the brave Farnetio, who was carried off by a peffilential disease, in the midst of his victories. The history of the next event has its rife in that of England; and Aretin c has recounted fo many curious particulars concerning the English adventurers of that time in Italy, unmixed with the fictions that prevailed concerning them, that an English reader must be pleased with an authentic information; the whole being hitherto justly deemed little better than a romance. We find ourselves, however, obliged to turn back to the English history to make our narrative clear.

Case of the banditti, and the English mercena-

UPON the conclusion of the treaty of Bretigny, in 1360, between Edward III. of England, and king John of France, a peace succeeded between the two nations, which deprived a vast number of foldiers of their bread, both princes keeping few troops more than were sufficient for garrisons d. It happened, that, during the war, numbers of English gentlemen and others had given leave to their retainers to build houses, which were generally fortified, upon lands conquered from the French king, and given by king Edward to his great lords, which lands now reverted to the French crown by the treaty of Bretigny. Many of the possessors of those castles. as they were called, refused to give them up, and were therefore proclaimed traitors by Edward's orders, though they pretended that they were in the pay of the king of Navarre, who disclaimed them; so that they were obliged to submit. Most of the owners of the castles were men who had seen

b Aretin, p. 173. C Ibid. p. 173.

agreat deal of service, and were either gentlemen by birth, a had raised themselves by their merit. Being asraid to return to England, and unable to subsist in France, they confalted together how to make their fortunes by their fwords. and Italy naturally presented itself first to their thoughts. All France at this time was filled with robberies by disbanded soldiers, who, in the spring of the year 1361, assembled at Givry in Bresse, to the number of fixteen thousand; many of them headed by the same leaders who had commanded them in time of war. Their first intention was to march to Avignon, to plunder the pope's immense treasures there. King John sent against them James of Bourbon, one of the most considerable noblemen in France; but the companions, or late-comers, (for they went by both names) foon beat his army with great flaughter, and he himself was killed, together with his fon. It is hard to fay what the consequence might have been, had not the English, to the number of four thousand horse and two thousand foot, detesting the cruelties and excesses of their companions, separated themselves from the main body, who foon after dispersed themselves into different parties, and were taken either into the pay of the pope, or of other princes.

THE English were commanded by Sir John Hawkwood, Account of This extraordinary person was a native of Heningham in Essex. Sir John His father was a tanner, and he himself bound apprentice to Hawka taylor, and by taking himself to the practice of arms, he wood, distinguished himself so greatly that he received the honour of knighthood, and probably before the peace of Bretigny he acquired a confiderable property as well as rank. first design, and that of his officers under him, was to offer their services to Florence, preserably to all other states, on account of the great losses the Florentines had suffered by the money they had so generously lent to the English. According to Aretin d, they actually made the offer immediately upon the death of Farnetio; but their demands being too. high, the Florentines rejected them, and they were obliged to enter into the service of Pisa. The same author gives another reason for their preferring the service of Florence (and it is confirmed by our histories and records) which is, that there was at that time so great a number of Florentines in England, that the English looked upon those in Italy as their own countrymen.

From this it appears, that Hawkevsod did not enter Italy, asis commonly thought, fingle and unattended, but at the

Pisan Jerwice.

who enters head of a very respectable force, which soon turned the of success against the Florentines. The Pisans, withou ficulty, granted them all their demands; and the Engli fooner took the field, than they marched through I Pistoia, and Prato, and encamped at Firetola, withir miles of Florence itself. The manner in which the E made war was very different from what the Florentine ever seen before, and incredible was the terror they i wherever they came. They proceeded, it is true, with Iword, and rapine, in which they did no more than the practice of the Italians themselves, but returned to with a much greater booty than had ever been known in such an expedition. The richness of it allured then fecond enterprize. They marched from Pisa to Empoli, lies between the rivers Elfa and Pefa; and leaving F. on the left hand, they came to Figline, in the vale of fo that they took it without much difficulty, and made an incredible booty. The boldness and rapidity of tho peditions struck the inhabitants with such consternation they abandoned many of their towns, and the English, a without resistance, took others. The Florentines ma their army to Ancisa, in the same vale, where they entre themselves; but in so awkward a way, that the English: their entrenchments, took their camp, and drove them In this engagement the Florentine general Farnetio, brother to the former general of that name made prisoner, together with a great number of othe cers and foldiers, and the Florentines lost all their car and ditch that reached from Ancifa to the Arno,

the Florentines.

He defeats and baggage. Next day the English broke through opened their way to Florence itself, where all were filled amazement and difmay. Some blamed the generals, the foldiers, and all agreed that they were betrayed, w allowing the valour of their enemies to have contribut their misfortunes. Eight hundred German horse, who in their camp, were immediately cashiered; and P_{ℓ} Malatesta, who happened to be at Florence during th overthrow, was appointed to fucceed the captive ge The Pisans gave out that they would come by the v Arezzo to Florence, by a certain day which they named in a bravading manner defired the Florentines to be re receive them. Upon this the Florentines, who really be them to be in earnest, fortified St. Miniato with five he foldiers, and threw up strong entrenchments for defendi the avenues to their city, waiting for their enemies wit utmost anxiety. But the Pisan foldiers having no ste for the expedition, the English left them at Figline, and forcing all the Florentine entrenchments in the night time, they came by break of day to Ripoli, within two miles of Florence, before their march was heard of. The whole city was infantly filled with uproar and consternation, and every man who could carry arms drew out before the gate; so that, induding the army which was then in Florence, their number could not be fewer than thirty thousand men, against six thousand English; but they never once thought of attacking the enemy; all their care was to defend themselves. From Florence the English returned to Figline, with a great many captives, and a large booty; and from thence marched to Arezzo, so that, to use Aretin's own words, they knocked by turns at the gates of Florence and Arezzo, taking Figline in the midway, and nothing, continues he, could be more terrible than the found of their name.

By the close of the campaign, however, the captives the Stratagem English had made were so numerous, and their booty so un- of the Engwieldy, that they were at some loss in contriving how to lish. carry them back to Pisa, especially as the way was encumbered and difficult. But this they effected by the following extraordinary stratagem. They sent a formal message to Florence, inviting the prefidents to affift in celebrating mass with them in Salviano's church at Florence, on the thirteenth of November. Were not the fact so well attested as it is by their own historian , one could scarcely imagine that the Florentines were absurd enough to give implicit credit to the mellage, and instead of making dispositions for harraffing and preventing the retreat of their enemies, they thought of nothing but of preparing to defend themselves by the appointed day, while the English, setting fire to their camp at Figline, returned unmolested to Pisa with all their plunder and prisoners.

IT is astonishing that a people, who, but a few months The Flobefore had behaved with fuch firmness and intrepidity as the rentines Florentines did against a numerous German army, should trem-defeat the ble within their own walls at the fight of a handful of Engis, whose motives for fighting were much the same as those of the Germans had been: but it is impossible to account for the difference of dispositions, which the alteration of circumstances may make amongst a people. The English were received in triumph by the Pisans, and by them admitted to winter in their city. According to our author, they had no reason to be fond of their new guests; for they had nothing they could call their own; the English engrossing all both without and within doors. As to the Florentines, they no sooner heard that the English were gone into winter-quarters than they took the field, and totally defeated the Pisans, who were belieging Barga. The Pisans applied to the English, who refusing to make a winter campaign, the Pisans were every where worsted.

they hire troops.

DURING the winter both parties prepared for a vigorous The Florentines hired troops in France and Germany, and the Pisans took into their pay three thousand German horse. The Florentine mercenaries did not arrive time enough to prevent the Pisans from opening the campaign with great advantages; but it does not appear that the English had ever been fond of acting in conjunction with the Pisans; for this year they crossed the river Marina in a separate body, and fell into the vale of Mugelli, where they got great booty, and made many prisoners. As to the Pisans and the Germans, they encamped between Prato and Pistoia. The Florentines were thus obliged to divide their troops; part were allotted for the defence of the city, and part to check the depredations of the English, who, however, returned to the Pisan camp, without seeing any enemy. The rest of the campaign consisted as usual of horrid depredations; and the Florentines, from their walls, had the mortification to fee their territory all in flames around them, and to hear the voices of their enemies, while they were belieging their city. In the mean while, however, a Florentine body of horse scoured the country round Pifa, and attemped, to take Legborn, but were obliged to return home, lest their retreat should have been cut off.

The English bought off by the Florentines;

IT is probable that the Pifans, before the end of this. campaign, would have made themselves masters of Florence. had not the Florentines tampered with the English, by offering them large fums to change their party. The English pleaded, their honour, and refused to fight against the Pisans; but I were prevailed upon not to fight against the Florentines, and offered to enter into their service against any other enemy than the Pisans. But the English general, Hawkwood, with a spirit far above his birth, rejected a neutrality of any kind, and, at the head of one thousand of his countrymen, remained in the Pifan fervice. The defection of the English from the Pisans, gave the Florentines vast spirits, and they. made Galecto Malatesta general of their army, which now amounted to above ten thousand foot and four thousand horse, all regular troops. Malatesta was one of the best; officers then in Italy, and he led his army without loss. within ' within four miles of Pisa. The Pisans of late had learned to despise the Florentines; and having an entire reliance on the valour and abilities of Hawkwood, they determined to give their enemies battle. Hawkwood, knowing how much his army had been weakened by the defection of the English, proceeded cautiously: he ordered a few squadrons of his horse to make frequent incursions towards the Florentine camp, and then to retire. This was repeated so often, that the Florentimes at last difregarded their alarms, which Hawkwood observing, he ordered the assault to be renewed, and made dispolitions for supporting his squadrons, who were then commanded to push on to the enemy's camp with his whole force. The Pisans, who made the attempt, were repelled by the valour of the Arezzians in the Florentine army, and, being seconded by the Florentines, eight hundred of them were killed, and two thousand taken prisoners. Upon this whose are Hawkwood gave a fignal for a retreat, which was performed my mutiin such good order to Sabino, where the main body lay, that nies, Malatesta ordered no pursuit should be made. After this the Flurentines returned home, and made a pompous exhibition of their prisoners along the streets of their city. Malatesta then again took the field; but he scarcely had entered the Pifan territory when his army refused to march farther, unless they were gratified with double pay. With great difficulty he appealed them; but in a day or two after the mutiny again broke out with such sury, that bloodshed ensued, and Malatesta, not chusing to proceed while his army was in such a temper, returned to Florence.

÷

THE Florentines retained so much of the Roman republican Magnanispirit, that when defeated they refused to treat of peace; mity of the but now that they had gained the victory, great numbers Floren. amongst them began to talk of an accommodation, and sometines. urged it in the strongest terms. Some political considerations intermingled with this defire of peace; for the more sensible of the Florentine magistracy became apprehensive, if the Pisans were too far pushed, that they would throw themselves under the protection of Barnabo duke of Milan, who only wanted such a pretext to make himself master of Tuscany. At last, Their peace by the mediation of the pope, the Pisans sent deputies to Pes-with the cia, where they conferred with those from Florence. During Pisans. those conferences Barnabo prevailed with John Agnelli, a Pifan, a creature of his own, to make himself chief magistrate, and this hastened the conclusion of the peace, which was both honourable and advantageous for Florence. Petrabona was given up to the Florentines; some Pisan fortifications were crazed, and the Pisans were re-admitted to all their former immuimmunities in Florence. Ten thousand ducats of gold were agreed to be paid in five years by the Pisans to the Florentines: and the latter had the glory of hearing the peace proclaimed at Pescia, in their own territory, while their army was in that of Pisa. The common people of Florence, however, were so far from being satisfied with those terms, that Carlo Strozza, who had mediated the peace under the pope, was in danger of his life from their rage. Soon after his holines invited the emperor Charles IV. into Italy, to defend him against Barnabo, and persuaded the Florentines to send sour of their principal citizens to attend him. His holiness was at great pains to bring the Florentines to an immediate declaration against Barnabo; but they flatly declined it, and thereby highly incenfed both the pope and the emperor. The latter. who had depended chiefly upon the Florentines, being fo poor that he could not pay an army, was obliged to clap up a peace with Barnabo, disbanded his foldiers, and went with a very mean retinue to Rome. Lombardy being now at peace. Charles intimated a design he had of visiting Florence. The Florentines immediately gueffed the truth, which was, that his visit would end in a demand of money, and they sent some deputies to him to found his dispositions towards their republic. Charles received them with great sternness, and up. braided their government for having usurped upon the imperial authority. He at the same time demanded of the Flori rentines, that they should deliver up to him all the Pratolines. the Volterran, and Lucquese territories.

The emtilities with the Florentines.

To give weight to this demand, he raised some troops and peror's bof-marched to Lucca, where he was honourably received; but his foldiers committing fome hostilities at St. Miniato, the Florentines affembled their army and repelled force by force. This and some other events that fell out, about the same. time, at Sienna and Pisa, threw all Tuscany once more into war; but all united against the emperor, who was obliged? to return to Germany. It is faid, however, not without pro+ bability a, that the Florentines, before Charles left Italy, made him a present of money for confirming their privileges. Aquarrel at this time happened between the Florentines and the inhabitants of St. Miniato, which being belieged by the Florentines, Barnabo came to relieve, on pretence of being invited thereto by the Miniatese. The Florentines upbraided him for the ungenerous return he had made to their not fiding."

Annales de l'Empire, par Voltaire. Vie de Charles IV. with-

with the pope and the emperor against him; and understanding his army was fet out to relieve the town, they pressed the fiege with more vigour than ever. Barnabo's general on this occasion was the famous Sir John Hawkwood, a name still terrible to the Florentines, whose general was Giovanni Regine, reckoned likewise an able soldier. When Hawk-Hawkwood approached the Florentine camp, he found it fortified in wood desuch a manner that it was unadviseable to attack it. He, feats the therefore, drew off to the distance of about ten miles. gave the Florentine magistrates and common soldiers such spi-tines. rits, that they upbraided Regino with cowardice, for refusing to lead them against the enemy. Finding that all his remonstrances were vain, "Let us march then, said he, since "it must needs be so. Those giddy-headed blunderers shall " foon find that I am destitute neither of courage nor con-"duct." He then left a fufficient number for defending the camp, and began his march by break of day against Hawkwood, who no fooner faw the Florentines advance in order of battle, than he affured himself of victory. He ordered his regular troops to take a plentiful refreshment, and to contain themselves within their trenches; but sent out his irregulars of all kinds to skirmish with his enemies, and thereby to encrease their fatigue after so long a march, during a sul-This stratagem had the defired effect, and Hawkwood, at the critical minute, fell with his fresh troops upon the Florentines with so much sury, that he obtained a cheap and a complete victory. The Florentine general was taken prisoner: the number of the flain and captives was very great, and the rout was total.

Notwithstanding this victory, the Florentines before St. Minist. Ministo made so good a countenance, that Hawkwood ato taken. durst not attempt to raise the siege, which, after the Florentine manner of proceeding, was carried on with greater spirit after their deseat than it had been before. Even Hawkwood's falling in with his victorious army into their country did not shake their resolution; and at last the place being betrayed to them, the authors of the revolt were carried to Florentials.

rence, and there put to death:

LUCCA was then possessed by an imperial governor, who The Flo-had strengthened his garrison with some of Barnabo's troops: rentines They were dismissed from that service upon the governor dispurchase covering that they designed to make themselves masters of the freedom for city. Upon their dismission the governor offered to restore the Lucte Lucquese to sull freedom upon paying him twenty-five quese.

thouland

thousand crowns of gold ² (A); but the Lucquese, having long lost their liberty, were consequently without property; and that noble city and fertile territory was not able to raise so poor a fum, though it was to purchase them the inestimable blessing of freedom. The Florentines generously and difinterestedly lent it to them, and fent it by some of their ablest citizens, who affisted the Lucquese in new modelling their state, they having, during their long thraldom, forgotten all the original principles of their constitution and government. The first step the Lucquese took to secure their recovered liberty. was to demolish the fort that Castruccio had built to bridle their city.

Great po-- Florentines.

THE Florentines at this time held in their hands the balicy of the lance of power in Lombardy, if not all over Italy, and it is wonderful with what address and resolution they managed it. In resentment of Barnabo having stirred up the revolt of St. Miniato, they entered into a treaty with pope Urban at Viterbo, and fent eight hundred horse to the affistance of his legate at Bologna. Barnabo was at that time befieging Reggie, in the Bolognese; and while the Florentine horse were on their march, some of his party appeared about Pisa. This obliged the Florentines to recal their cavalry for some time; but Barnabo's troops declined an engagement; and the Florentines resuming their march to Lombardy, came time enough to asfift in beating Barnabo, and in raising the siege of Reggio. The excessive heats and fatigues of this campaign cost Donati, the Florentine general, his life. Soon after a peace fucceeded between the pope and Barnabo; and the Florentines, having withdrawn their troops from Lombardy, fent deputies to Avignon, to congratulate Gregory XI. upon his accesfion to the popedom. Those deputies found his holiness somewhat distatisfied with regard to the state of affairs in Tufcany; but matters were somewhat cleared up when the Perugians, for want of the necessaries of life, were obliged to submit themselves to his legate, and that too without terms.

d Aretin, pag. 179.

(A) There is no fuch coin as eleven thousand and fixty-one calculation (1), the fum here rate of money. demanded feems to amount to a crown of gold in Tuscany; pounds one shilling and threebut according to Mr. Busching's pence sterling, at the present

⁽¹⁾ See Busching's Geography, vol. iii. pag. 8.

A kind of an accommodation, however, was clapped up between his holiness and the Florentines, in which were included the Pisans and Siennese, the Arexuians, and the Luc-

THE Florentines had now long preserved the face of domeffic unanimity; they had met with no blows but what were easily recoverable, and the riches of their state at this time were beyond belief. The democratical part of their goternment was in some respects perhaps too prevalent; but it had the effect of preserving unanimity amongst the noble or great families. Some of those families, however, by accommodating themselves partly to the manners and partly to the professions of the plebeians, had rifen to prodigious wealth and credit with their fellow-citizens. Of these the chief were the families of Albicii and Ricci, who, having reparate interests, split the whole state into factions. The Florentine plebeians, upon recollection, had good fense enough to conclude that one or other of those families might invade their constitution, and therefore a public act passed, that neither of them should be admitted into any post of trust or power in the state. This resolute but rational determination was succeeded by some years of so great tranquility, as to afford nothing material for history to transmit during that period, farther than, that all the power of the Ubaldi, the ancient enemies of the Florentine state, was then extinguished in the Cafantine; and that many noble edifices, though erected in that infant age of true taste, now arose, and still do credit to Italy.

WE are now arrived at the year 1375, which opens a new scene of history. Ever fince the time of Clement VI. the 1375. popes had generally been either Frenchmen, or in the French Great spiinterest; and, residing at Avignon, they had managed their rits of the Italian possessions by legates, or governors, who of all mankind Florenwere the most execrable and oppressive. Under the specious tines shew of papal authority, they extended their tyranny over free against the states; they took the banditti, with which Italy then swarmed. pope, into their pay; and they justified the most execrable of their actions, when unsucceisful, by their master's orders, and when successful, by the plenitude of their own power, both which they knew to be indisputable. Their excesses put the Florentines to great inconveniences. They had always profelled themselves Guelphs, and so artfully had they managed matters, that the popes had never been able to dissolve The papal court and legates, sensible of their constitution. the Florentine system of policy, durst not break with their state, and depended upon accidents for bending them to the the pope's will. An accident of that kind presented itself this year. The Florentine state was afflicted with famine, through the sterility of the season, and had applied again and again to the legate of Bologna for some relief, which he flatly refused them. The autumn promised well; but the legate, determined to impose the papal yoke on the necks of the Florentines, fent a great army into their territories, to prevent their reaping their harvest. The reader is here to observe, that all Italy continued still to be full of mercenary foldiers, and fuch were they whom the legate employed on, this occasion; the Florentines, therefore, wisely resolved to see rather than fight their enemies, who, for money, became their good friends, to the legate's great surprize and disappointment. About the same time it was discovered, that the legate had practifed with the inhabitants of Prate to revolt from the Florentines, which might have been attended with the ruin of the Florentine state.

They engage the Italian Sert their liberties.

THE elevated genius of the Florentine government and people again manifested itself on this occasion. All orden and ranks united in a hearty detestation of the clergy; but flates to af- at the same time without any virulent expressions of their indignation. They chose eight of the ablest and most unexceptionable men in their state as a council of war; and the plan on which they proceeded, was the noblest that can be imagined, for it confifted in exciting the neighbouring states to affert their liberties. Impelled and affisted by them, the inhabitants of Citta di Castello took arms against the garrison that bridled them, and expelled it. The pope's legate at Perugia fent a body of troops to reinforce the garrison, and the Perugians took that opportunity of taking arms, expelling the legate, and making themselves matters of the strong citadel built to overawe them; all which they did by the affistance of the Florentines. After this the people of Speletto, Gubio, Forli, Viterbo, and a great many other places in the papal dominions, especially in the Pescara, declared themfelves independent of the pope. In short, the flame that had been long smothered, now blazed forth in full fury. The Italians had long detested the pride and haughtiness of the legates, who, as our author a elegantly expresses himself, employed no arts of government but foldiers and citadels. The Florentines, sensible of this, did all they could to spread the conflagration wider, their fundamental policy confishing in having as few powerful neighbours as possible. The people of Granavioli, a place now so inconsiderable, that it is scarcely marked in the maps of Italy, took arms against the legate, and he sent Hawkwood, who, with his small band of Englishmen, was now in the pope's pay, from Bologna, to reduce them. Scarcely had Hawkwood lest Bologna, when the Bolognese, having been before prepared by the Florentine council of war, took arms and afferted their own independency, which they had no sooner done than they received a powerful reinforcement from Florence to maintain it.

THE view we have exhibited of the states of Tuscany, and in neighbourhood, is taken from the most unquestionable Italian authorities before the reformation; and therefore we cannot doubt that Hawkwood and his Englishmen, though they had been hired for conveniency by the pope or his legate, in their own hearts most sincerely detested the papal tyranny. Hawkwood, perceiving that Granavioli was irrecoverable, took up his quarters in Faenza, where, according to our author^a, a great many acts of violence, and some of cruelty were committed; and at last Hawkwood, perhaps, because he was not paid by the legate, sold the place to the Ferraress.

POPE Gregory was then at Avignon, but was minutely informed of every thing that had happened in Italy, and had thundered out his excommunications against Florence. Upon this the Florentines, who were always decent, appointed Alessantine Antilla and Donato Barbadorio, two of the most learned and eloquent men of their state, to go to Avignon, and to plead the cause of Florence before the pope; but though they did this in the most moving manner, the interdicts against Florence were confirmed, and their goods sentenced to be confiscated wherever sound. The spirit which Barbadorio manifested on this occasion was great and memorable. As Courage of soon as the pope had pronounced the sentence against his a Floren-hearing of his holiness, he exclaimed, "Oh God! we the deputy." deputies of the Florentines, appeal to thy equity from this "unjust sentence of thy vicar. Thou who art subject neither to deceit nor anger; Thou who lovest the liberty but not "the slavery of thy people; Thou who hatest tyrants, and "the lusts of tyrants, desend at this time the liberty of the "Florentine people, and become their auspicious guardian."

country, he turned round to an image of God, and in the tine

THE pope, in order to reduce the Bolognese, whose revolt The pope he entirely imputed to the Florentines, hired a body of Bretons, takes the who, in autumn this year, arrived in Italy; upon which the Bretons Florentines sent the greatest part of their own troops to defend into pay,

ARETIN, pag. 181.

Bologna, and blocked up all the passes of the Appennines, to exclude the enemy from their territory. The legate of Geneva headed the Bretons, who consisted of fix thousand borse and three thousand foot; but he affected to proceed with valt tenderness towards the Bolognese. He suffered no ravages to be committed in their territory, and fent several mediages, offering them pardon and amnesty for all that had passed, which inclined a great number of the inhabitants to submit; and at last a conspiracy was formed for that purpose, which was defeated by the vigilance of Varanio of Camerino. The legate still continued to hover round the city. About the fame time another conspiracy was discovered, for putting Arezzo into the hands of Saco's fons; and the conspirators were brought to condign punishment. Towards the end of the fummer the Bretons, being baffled in all their attempts against Florence, retired to Cesena, which opened its gates to them. The new guests, however, behaved with such brutality in their quarters, that the inhabitants ran to their arms, and after killing about fourfcore of them upon the spot, drove the rest out of their city. The crasty legate seemed to fide with the townsmen, and at last persuaded the latter to lay down their arms, which they had scarcely done when the legate again introduced his Bretons into the city, where they massacred three thousand of the townsmen.

and comes to Italy.

WHILE the flames of war were thus spreading all over Italy, the pope having taken a fresh body of English into his pay, left Avignon, and came to Italy, in hopes of restoring the papal authority in that country. Being arrived at Rome, he invited the Florentines to treat of peace with him, and deputies were named accordingly; but after a month's conferences the pope's demands were fo high, that they returned to Florence without any thing being concluded; upon which the Florentines made preparations for continuing the war with greater vigour than ever. In this they were secretly affished by Barnarbo of Milan; and they found means to bring over to their service the English who were in the pope's pay. This desection gave his holiness vast uneasiness. The eight Florentines, who had hitherto acted as field deputies, had behaved so well, that their commissions were continued by the magistracy, to the great discontent of the people. laid hold of this variance to widen the breach between them, and fent letters by his agents, directed not as usual to the magistracy, but to the people of Florence, loading the deputies with grievous accusations. But this expedient failed of fuccess, and raised the people's indignation, not so much against the deputies as against the pope. The interdict still tentinued; but by the authority of the magistracy and people, all religious ordinances were celebrated in the churches as usual. At last the pope, who was Gregory XI. intrigued with John the bishop of Arezzo, to bring that city over from its alliance with the Florentines; but the Arezzians no sooner understood this than they ran to arms, and not only expelled the bishop and all his adherents, but burned down their houses, and put some of his relations, who had been engaged in the conspiracy, to death.

THAT same year Rodolfo of Camerino, the Florentine ge- The Floneral, seized Fabriano, by consent of the citizens, who wanted rentines to put themselves under the Florentine protection; but when seize Fathe Florentine field-deputies demanded, on the part of the briano. republic, possession of the place, he not only refused to give it up, but went into the service of their enemics, and received from the pope the command of five hundred horse. Perhaps the admission of the English into the Florentine service, was the true cause of his desection. The Florentines hung bis effigies, with all the marks of infamy, through the most public parts of the city, and deprived him of Fabriano. Towards the end of the year, by the mediation of Barnabo of Milan, a treaty was fet on foot between the Florentines and the pape, who had now recovered full possession of Bologna, and the conferences were held at Serezana; but when both parties were on the point of an accommodation the pope died, and the negotiation was broken off.

SECT. VI.

Two Popes elected; Discord in France; new Institutions there; farther Exploits of Sir John Hawkwood in the Florentine Service; Intrigues of the Emperor. Charles IV. and his Journey to Rome; Disturbances at Florence renewed; the Duke of Anjou arrives in Italy; Sir John Hawkwood enters into the Service of the Emperor; Death of Lewis of Anjou; the Florentines lose and recover Arezzo; Revolutions of the Visconti Family in Lombardy; Distractions of Italy; great Power of Galeazzo Duke of Milan; Death of Urban the Antipope; the Florentines engaged in a War with the Milanese; Successes of the Florentines; Continuation of the History of the brave Sir John Hawkwood; Peace between Galeazzo and the Florentines, who enter into League with the French King in the Year 1305.

A schism in the popedom.

IPON the death of pope Gregory XI. the cardinals bein met to chuse his successor, the inhabitants of Rome best the conclave, and demanded that he should be a Roman, at least an Italian, and not a Frenchman or foreigner; upo which Bartholomew, archbishop of Bari, a Neapolitan, w chosen. Being a proud intractable man, the cardinals per tended that they were under constraint when they chose him and retiring to Fundi, they proceeded to a new election which fell upon the bishop of Geneva; the same who ha been the pope's legate in Tuscany, and had headed the Bri The first took the name of Urban VI. and the latt that of Clement VII. and thus the foundation of a schism wi laid, which lasted from competitor to competitor to the year 1417. The Florentines, however, acknowledged Urban & the true pope, and the schism so wholly engrossed the mix of the public, that all farther thoughts of war between the pope and the Florentines were dropt.

Civil difgin at Florence.

A STATE of tranquility thus succeeding, civil commotion Sentions be- as usual arose amongst the Florentines. The power of the eight officers, whom we have called field-deputies, becan now formidable to the nobility, who loaded them with the blame of all that the Florentines had suffered from the inter dicts of the popes; and their party being very powerful i the state, they renewed an absurd ill-grounded law, which the posterity of those who had been proscribed. disqualified from any share in the magistracy. Their ceedings were attended with great rigour and injustice, admonitions were sent round to all they disliked, discharge them from their posts in the public, or disqualifying the from entering upon any. This tyranny at last became tolerable, and Silvester Medix, or Medici, who was then gonfalonier, resolving to restrain it, presented some propoto the magistracy for that purpose, which meeting with ope fition, a general infurrection of the people enfued, in while the houses of those who had been the most forward in & ercifing this admonitory law were burnt or destroyed, their owners would have undergone the fame fate, had the not faved themselves by flight. An end being thus put the admonitory law, eighty citizens were chosen to ford kind of court of appeal, to redrefs the grievances of all w had suffered by it. But this triumph of the populace attended with fatal effects to the state. The lowest of rabl rabble, and men of the most desperate fortunes, thought they had as good a right as the most creditable citizens had to places in the magistracy, and began to form cabals and mightly meetings, each carving out the post he designed for bimself in the government. The presidents having proof Alterations of those nightly meetings b, four of the principals were or- of its godered to be apprehended, that the bottom of their defigns wernment. might be known. The mob upon this took arms, and demanded that their fellows should be released; but this not being immediately complied with, they burnt down the house of Luigi Guicciardini, who happened then to be gonfalonier, as they did the houses of a great many rich citizens; and they had even the insolence to hang, in the fight of the presidents themselves, one of the magistrates, who had been active in endeavouring to suppress them. They then proceeded to the palace of the prefidents, and other public offices, which they broke open and plundered, and forced the prefidents to refign their authority, and to return back as private men to their own houses. After this they entered the palace Michael in triumph, and chose Michael Landi, one of the meanest Landi amongst themselves, gonfalonier, and the rest of the magistracy chosen gonout of their own order; but seemed still to have some regard falonier. for Silvester Medix, and another knight Benedict Alberti: but their authority could not prevent the goods of the rich from being plundered, the best of the citizens from being driven into exile, and the most horrid outrages from being perpetrated.

THE Florentine historian on this occasion indulges himself His chain many very sensible remarks upon the danger of magistrates racter, taking part with the people in their attempts, forcibly to regulate even what is amis in a state. He observes, that the Media was one of the worthiest men in Florence, and the the admonitory law was detestable in itself, yet the manner in which it was repealed was the occasion of all the public calamities that immediately ensued, by giving the common people an opportunity of knowing their own strength. A kind of miracle, however, interposed at this disorderly juncture in savour of Florence.

MICHAEL LANDI (A), the rebel's gonfalonier, tho' thosen by them for the desperate state of his fortune, and the intre-

b Aretin, pag. 190. c Id. ibid.

(A) Machiavel, who, for particular reasons of his own, is the dignity of so great a writer as he was, tells us that this very intrepidity of his conduct, happened to be a wife, worthy, and brave man. He had served long abroad; had studied the nature both of men and government; and he had somewhat noble and commanding in his manner and person. Had it not been for his virtue, there had now been an end of the constitution and government of Florence, as the ungovernable passion of the people for blood, rapine, revenge, and devastation appeared every day to gather strength. Landi seems to have foreseen this, and endeavoured to stop its progress. Far from being daunted by the fury of his countrymen, he chaflized it with fo much dignity of behaviour, that, desperate as they were, they durst not resist him. The mob, however, resolved to wreak their rage upon the presidents, whose palace they befet, commanding them to come down to their tribunal, to pass such laws as should be proposed to them, and which were in themselves detestable. The presidents had foreseen this attack, and having barricadoed their palace, they answered from a window, that they were resolved not to appear in public till the rioters had laid down their arms, and should attend them in a respectable manner, promising they would then pass such good laws as should be legally pro-The rioters perceiving those presidents not to be of the same timid cast with their predecessors, departed, and in a few days after created eight prefidents of their own, whom they invested with all the badges of public power. It is wonderful to confider the effects that even the appearance of public authority has upon the minds of men; for some of the most respectable citizens in Florence complied with the mock tribunal, which went on in the regular dispatch of business. This acquiescence gave the usurpers so much encouragement. that they ventured to fend some of their officers, and of their clerks, to the legal prefidents, demanding them to fwear to the validity of their decrees and proceedings. The formality and folemnity with which this demand was made, startled the presidents so much, that they were enclined to comply, when the gonfalonier Landi, drawing his fword, cut one of the messengers across the face, ran another thro' the body, and drove the rest out of the house. He had gone too far to stop there; he inatched up the standard of justice, carried it into the street in one hand, with his drawn fword in the other, and being mounted on a very fine horse, he summoned all who wished well to and magnanimity.

> extraordinary person, when he comber of wool; that he was was elected, happened to have the standard of justice in his hand; that by trade he was a bare-footed, and had scarce a rag to cover him.

their country to attend him. Being foon surrounded by a band of brave worthy citizens, he resolutely proceeded to the place where the mock tribunal was held, but sound it abandoned: for the party, understanding what treatment their messengers had met with, had taken arms, and were then marching through other quarters of the town, with a design to attack the palace of the presidents on its weakest side. The gonfalonier upon this returned to the palace, but sound the avenues to it beset by the saction. That magistrate had He subdues had the presence of mind to put every part of the palace in the rabble, a state of desence against any popular attempt during his absence, and he attacked the rioters with so much intrepidity, that they were put to slight and totally dispersed.

The peace of the city being thus restored, a new magistracy was regularly chosen at the stated time; but a law passed that from thenceforth no president should be chosen out of the lower ranks of the people; and even two, who had been elected, were on that account exauctorated, and their places supplied by two knights, one of whom was Gregorio Scala, one of the greatest citizens in Florence, and a prosessed enemy to the admonitory laws. Our historian informs us, that the peace of the city was greatly confirmed by pope Urban relieving it from the interdict under which his predecessor had laid it.

An elegant writer cobserves, that the Florentines made the Reflection. fame figure at this time in Italy as the Athenians had done in Greece. The fine arts appeared in no part of Europe but amongst them: and they were by far the most respected people in Italy. Their civil diffentions, however unhappy, encreased their courage, and added to their experience. In matters of religion, though they professed themselves votaries to the see of Rome, they exercised the independency that became a free people, and were, perhaps, the most void of superstition of may we read of in history. When the pope touched upon the ftring of sovereignty over them, they acted with the same spiix against him, as they had done against the emperors and their own tyrants; and what is most incredible in that bigotted age, his fulminations and interdicts served but to encrease their unanimity in despising them, while in other countries they were dethroning princes, and subverting conlitutions. Next to this the great character of the Florentines consisted in the good faith with which they fulfilled all their engagements, and in their passion for freeing all the other states of Italy from tyranny. We do not pretend to say that this passion was entirely disinterested, because, as the Athenians did amongst the states of Greece, the Florentines always took the lead amongst those of Italy; but it ought to be mentioned, to their honour, that we have not upon record any act of unprovoked oppression that they were guilty of towards their neighbours; nor do we know one instance of their infringing the terms upon which any people came into their alliance, or under their protection (B).

d An. 1375. Annales de l'Empire, par Voltaire

State of Florence.

From the foregoing part of this history, our readers will easily perceive that there existed at this time in Florence three different ranks of men, the nobles, the commons, or plebeians, and the rabble. The former excelled in dignity and riches, the second in spirit and integrity, and the latter were diffinguished by brutal force and unsteady counsels. commons beheld with horror the precipice from which they had lately escaped, and to which they had been led by their too violent aversion to the nobility. Aretin and Machiavel are very justly profuse in their commendations of Michael; Landi, who, had he not been proof against all ambition and; dishonesty, might have erected at this time, over his country, a tyranny worse than any she had yet experienced, nay worse than what she was threatened with by the duke of Athens. His wildom was equal to his integrity. By his influence the corporations of the meaner fort of people were annulled, as were all the offices they had bestowed, his own and that of Lewis Pucchio, and some others of high quality, excepted. In other respects the distribution of public honours was wise and politic, being divided between the greater and the leffer trades, of whom five of the latter and four of the former were always to refide with the magistracy, who were now all nobility, in This preference of the lower trades had a wone the palace.

(B) We have hitherto chiefly followed Aretin in this hiltory, both because he was prior in point of time, and most disinterested with regard to sacts, not to mention the beauty of his stile and manner. Machiavel after him wrote indeed the history of Florence, but he adapted it to the juncture of time in which he lived; a consideration to which we ought to have no regard, especially as there is no material difference in sacts between him and Arctin, or the other historians. But as we are now come to a period very near near to that in which the family of Medicis began to make the chief figure in Florence, Machie wel's information, as to facts must be supposed superior to that of any other historian or that age or country, and there fore we must consider his history as our chief directory to the year in which it is finished.

deful effect in settling the minds of the poorer sort; but it laid the foundation of a new distinction in Florence, between the popular and the plebeian faction. The former, consisting of the rich citizens, and the latter of the poorer; but Florence at this time lay under another inconveniency, which may be said to have been inherent to its constitution. Placability and forgiveness formed no part of that people's character; and during those civil differitions, which lasted three years, a great number of citizens had been driven into exile.

THOSE exiles naturally united in a body, and, having a Proceedfrong party within the city, they became very formidable to ings of the the magistracy. At first they rendezvoused near Sienna, and exiles. they attempted to make themselves masters of Fighini, but were disappointed. After this, part of them entered into the tervice of Charles of Durazzo, who, at the instigation of pope Urban, was then making preparations for a war against the unhappy Joan queen of Naples, because she adhered to his rival Clement. This increased the uneasiness of the Florentine government, as Charles was strongly supported by his kinsman the king of Hungary. The Florentines, however, without being disconcerted with the difficulties they had to encounter, tent deputies to wait upon Charles, under pretence of medisting a peace between the Venetians and the Genoese; but, in reality, to discover his sentiments towards their state. The deputies were Strozzi, Barbadorio, and Benevenuto. Having discharged their commission, they returned to Florence, where The Flothey differed in their report. Strozzi made light of Charles rentine and his power; but inveighed bitterly against the exiles. Bar-ambassabadorio was of a different opinion as to Charles and his views; dors differ. but said he had not given himself the trouble to enquire aught about the exiles, which brought him into a suspicion of fa-Gianazzo of Salerno was then lieutenantvouring them. general to Charles in Italy, and, affembling all the Florentine exiles, he made dispositions for marching from Bologna to Florence. The magistracy there being informed of this fact, and that a great party within the city was ready to receive him, the whole state was thrown into confusion. The informer was Antonio count of Bruscoli, a man of very bad principles; and he named amongst the conspirators some of the greatest nobility, particularly Peter Albizi, Charles Stozzi, Capriani Maugion, Giacomo Sacchetti, Donato Barbadorio, Philip Strozzi, and John Anselmi. Albizi was then the most respected citizen of Florence, and was living upon his own estate in the country, where the Florentine soldiers seized him. Though his tenants could eafily have rescued him, yet so concious was he of his own innocence, that he commanded them to death.

bles inno-

to defift, and went along with his guards. Carlo Strozzi alone escaped; and, to increase the terror of the citizens, new levies of troops were made; and four persons (A), of whom Thomas Strozzi and Bennet Alberti are only named, were appointed, with a kind of dictatorial power, to command the army and militia, and to take care that the state should receive no pre-Many no- judice. The trials of the illustrious prisoners then came on, and all the horrors of a too democratical government appeared cently put in their strongest colours. The judge, whose name we know not, appointed to try them, acquitted them, even of the fuspicion of treason; but such was the sury of the mob, that, besetting the tribunal, they would have torn him to pieces, had he not found them guilty; and they were accordingly put to death. The mob then laid down their arms, and each returned to his own home. But they foon refumed them; when the time for the election of new prefidents approached. The Fiorentine historians very justly bewail the state of their country at this time. They who prefided in the government were conscious that they had been guilty of murdering the noblest and most innocent persons of the state, and trembled at the confequences. Then they added crime to crime for their own security. They admonished or banished all whom they suspected; and every law they could devise was passed for their indemnification, and the continuance of their power. At last, by the advice of the council of four, that has been already mentioned, forty-fix magistrates were created a, who, with the prefidents, and the other magistrates, were to purge the state of all disaffected persons, and to settle the government as they thought proper. This new council made full use of their powers. They admonished, that is, they disqualified thirty fix citizens: they reduced twenty noble families to the rank of plebeians, and raifed twenty plebeian to that of nobility; besides enacting many severe laws against the unfortunate exiles; and, to render their power as stable as possible, they made Sir John Hawkwood general of all the troops of the republic.

Charles of

ABOUT this time, Gianazzo of Salerno enrolled in the fer-Durazzo vice of his master Charles of Durazzo, all the Florentine patronizes exiles; and seemed to make dispositions for besieging Florence the exiles. itself with a great army of Italians, Germans, and Hungarians. He fell first into the Siennese, and then into the Pisan territory,

² Machiavel, book iii.

(A) Machiavel says only though two of them were of two; but Aretin mentions four, the dregs of the people.

tory, and both gave him a fum of money to prevent their being ravaged. Gianazzo then approached Florence, which likewise sought to buy its peace, Hawkwood being not yet arrived; but Gianazzo rejected all pecuniary offers, and infifted upon the exiles re-admission into the city. This demand was not complied with; and the Florentines, having sent an express for Hawkwood, put their city in a posture of defence. It appears, that neither Charles nor his lieutenantgeneral had any real design upon the Florentines, farther than to keep them neutral in the quarrel between him and Youn queen of Naples, whom he intended to dethrone. Gianazzo, however, marched within nine miles of Florence; but Hawkwood, by this time having entered upon his command, foon checked his progress, and obliged him to retire. Charles of Durazza was now returned from Hungary to Italy, and was very earnest in soliciting the friendship of the Florentines, who declined taking any concern in the quarrel between him and the queen of Naples. Charles knew the vast influence the Florentines had in the affairs of Italy; and taking advantage of some domestic differitions at Arexxo, he made himself maker of that city. This near neighbourhood to Florence, eccasioned many hostilities between his troops and the Florentines, and he continued to take into his pay all the Florentine exiles, who were so insolent, that they put to death one of the deputies fent from Florence to Charles. This increased the refentment of the Florentines both against the exiles and Charles.

AT last Hawkwood was ordered to take the field, which Hawkhe did with so much spirit, that he checked the progress of wood takes Charles, who sent ambassadors to Florence to solicit its friend-the field. thip. He even pretended, that the Florentines had made him a promise of affistance. The Florentines received the embassy with great politeness; but observed, that their promise was upon a condition which had been rejected by his cousin the king of Hungary, and therefore was no longer binding: they, however, made him a present of forty thousand ducats, on condition that their territory should not be molested by his troops. Upon this, Charles returned to Arezzo, where he made an apology to the Florentine exiles for being at that time obliged to drop their cause, on account of his expedition against Naples. From thence he moved to Rome, where A. D. he was most kindly received by pope Urban; and at last he made himself master of the kingdom of Naples, and the person of the unhappy queen Juan, whom he put to death.

THE Florentines were the more alarmed at his success, as they knew that all the hopes of their exiles depended on him.

1381.

They

They resolved, however, if possible, to keep well with him, and fent him a deputation, at the head of which were Roberto Aldobrandini and Bettino Covonio, to congratulate him on his accession to his kingdom. He received them with seeming friendship; and, upon their return to Florence, the jealousy of the state towards Charles was somewhat allayed. About this time the Gibelin faction regained their ascendency at Arezzo; but were foon dispossessed, and all that territory was for six or feven months filled with civil commotions.

rence.

FLORENCE had now, in fact, nothing to fear but bles in Flo-faction, and that soon blasted all the benefits, she enjoyed from peace. Every day produced new plots against the government; and the wifer and nobler part of the citizens chose to live retired and private, rather than to enjoy the highest preferments in the state. Two noblemen of great rank and family, George Scali, and Thomas Strozzi, had discovered 2 new path to power, by declaring themselves the patrons of the plebeians. They were attended by guards, and their proceedings against their fellow citizens were unjust and arbitrary; nor was any subject in the state safe, if they had conceived umbrage against him. One John Cambio, a citizen of note, was by one of their spies or guards accused of designs against the state. The charge was found to be malicious and groundless; and the judge, who had cognizance of it, was inclined to have put the accuser to death, when the two demagogues, his patrons, rescued him out of custody, and would have killed the judge, could they have found him; but he (B) retired to the palace of the presidents, where he laid open the danger of the city from the excessive power of those tyrants, and offered to relign his office.

Scali put to death.

THE magistrates, sensible of the public danger, instantly resolved to seize that opportunity, and to free their country from the power of its two tyrants. The house of the judge, or gonfalonier, had been plundered. They counselled him to remain in his office, and promifed to indemnify him for all his losses. After this they fell into serious consultations amongst themselves, and determined to act up to the dignity of government. They placed guards about their palace. and fent a party to arrest George Scali, who had been the most active in the late rescue. His insolence, and that of Strozzi had by this time made both of them obnoxious, even to the citizens whom they patronized; and so fickle is popular fayour, that Scali was apprehended without the least resistance, none of his numerous attendants daring to oppose, and Strozzi made his escape. All of a sudden the people demanded justice upon their late tyrants, whom they execrated. Scali, the very day after his apprehension, was publicly put to death, and some of his dependents were torn in pieces by the. enraged multitude. The state of Florence was now in a critical fituation; for the commonalty, always in extremes, proceeded to violences which threatened the destruction of the city. The admirable wisdom of the presidents interposed. They knew their countrymen would cool, if they had but leilure; and they summoned several public conventions, or assemblies, to give them time for recollection. The event was, that after some of the instruments of the late democracy had been brought to condign punishment, one hundred citizens were chosen for reforming or obviating all the maladies of the state. The standard of justice was then produced, and a perambulation was performed by the new magistrates, with it in front, all over the city, which passed with great tranquility and public approbation. After this, many of the popular laws against the nobles were rescinded, and great numbers of captives were freed from prison; so that there was a general expectation that all the exiles would be reflored. In the mean while, two new companies of trades, which had been erected out of the scum of the people, were abolished, by which all the others were reduced to the number of twenty-one.

ARETIN. pag. 197.

(B) The whole of this in- English translation of Michiavel cident is misrepresented in the History of Florence.

THE Neapolitan party of Charles of Durazzo took advan-Hawktage of the unsettled situation of affairs in Florence, and moved wood opfrom Arezzo to Marciali, to the number of three thousand poses the five hundred. Upon this, Hawkwood was dispatched with Neapolisome troops to observe their motions, and he encamped in tans and their fight; but, not standing a battle, they were pursued by exiles. Hawkwood into the Arezzian territory. All this while, matters were in so violent an agitation in Florence, that it can scarcely be faid, with propriety, that any form of government existed there. Every day produced skirmishes, sometimes between the old and new nobility, sometimes between the plebeians and the more wealthy citizens. The exiles, without leave, returned, being fure of protection from one or the other party. At last, the party of the nobility prevailed. All the upstart corporations were disenfranchised; the Guelphs were restored to all their honours and dignities; the plebeians were reduced to a third share of the government, and rendered incapable of succeeding to certain high posts, particu-Ist/A larly that of gonfalonier; and all who had been exiled fince the time that Silvester Medici was in that post, were readmitted into the state.

IT is often the misfortune of popular governments, that Tyranny of the nobles. they carry every thing to extremes. The nobles of Florence, now prevailing, carried matters with as high a hand as the plebeians had done before. All the friends of the ancient constitution, that is, of the most creditable commons, now fuffered a kind of proscription; and even the great services which Michael Landi had done his country, could not screen him from the rage of his enemies. The wifer and better part of the citizens disliked this sudden revolution of power; and some, amongst whom was George Alberti, a great noble-A. D. 1382.

man, exclaimed against it; which made the ruling party resolve, if possible, to ruin him. While matters were in this untowardly fituation at home, the Florentines received an alarm from abroad, that Lewis of Anjou was marching, as the adopted son of queen Joan of Naples, to drive Charles of Durazzo out of Italy. The Florentines, having no reason to expect any favour from the French, flood on their guard, and invited all the states of Tuscany to unite with them against Lewis, in case he should make any attempt in his march on their liberties. Perhaps their precautions at this time faved them. All that Lewis did was to require them to observe 2 Africa neutrality; and Charles of Durazzo, now king of Naples, did the same. The Florentines at this time held the ballance of power in Italy, being courted by four great princes, to wit, pope Urban, the duke of Anjou, the king of Naples, and the king of Hungary. Their own inclinations led them to fide with pope Urban and the king of Naples; but they prudently stuck to their neutrality; and, having prevailed on the other Tusian states to join in the proposed confederacy, they gave good words to all, but declared for none. The Bolognese, who had come into the general alliance, were apprehensive that Lewis designed to seize their city; but the Florentines acted towards them with so much honour and firmness, that they remained unmolested. Lewis had entered Italy at the head of a vast army; and being joined by all the friends of queen Joan, his party was very powerful. Pope Urban, next to the king of Naples, had the most to fear from the French; and he earnestly applied to the Florentines for money to defend himself, his solicitation being backed by the king of Naples. This request could not be granted consistently with the neutrality the Florentines had embraced; and yet they thought it necessary to prevent the French from getting footing in Italy. They therefore privately supplied Hawkwood with the money the pope had requested; and he, paying his soldiers with it, went into the service of his holiness, to the great joy of Charles, and the displeasure of Lewis.

The French now saw that the real sentiments of the Flo-The Florentines were bent against them, and Lewis applied to the rentines French king for a confiscation of all the effects of the Floren join tines in his country. This served only to unite them more Charles of strictly with Charles, who was still in possession of Arezzo. Durazzo. The Florentines, dissiking such a neighbourhood, would willingly have regained that city; and some steps were concerted for that purpose, but not executed, the Neapolitan governor's instructions not being sufficiently clear on that head. The Florentines, however, took possession of many sortresses in the Arezzian territory; but avoided giving the smalless umbrage to Charles, who about this time succeeded to the kingdom of Hungary.

This year the Florentines had a difference at once with Their difter Genoese and the Venetians; but upon very different ac-ference counts. At the close of the last war between those two states, with the the Florentines became sureties for the payment of one hun-Venetians dred and fifty thousand ducats, in case the island of Tene- and Genoese was not delivered to the Genoese; and no such delivery noese. being performed, the Genoese made a demand upon the Florentines for the money, which obliged the latter to apply to the Venetians for their indemnistication. The Venetians pretended, that the governor of the island alone was to blame, and that they were ready to deliver it up. We are not told in what manner this affair was compromised; but it is probable the prudence of the Florentines extricated them from the difficulty; for they lived in harmony with both states.

A SEVERE pestilence now broke out in Florence, which drove most of the inhabitants into the country. The government became apprehensive, that the plebeian faction might take advantage of this depopulation to refume its power, and many laws were passed for detaining the inhabitants within the city: but the pestilence being more dreadful than the penalty of the law, it was in a manner abandoned; and all public offices being thut up, scarcely any thing was transacted worthy of mention in history. Next year a strong reinforcement came to the duke of Anjou from France; and, in their passage to Naples, they endeavoured to make themselves mastens of Arezzo, by the affiftance of some of the banished Arezzians. They succeeded so far as to seize the city; but could Siege of not master the citadel. This news spread consternation Arezzo. amongst the Florentines; but they were somewhat comforted by receiving certain intelligence of the death of Lewis of Anjou, which they communicated to the French without being The siege of the citadel of Arezzo was continued with more fury than ever; but the French, being convinced that the duke of Anjou was dead, intirely changed their system. and, after some negociating, they sold Arezzo to the Florentines; upon which the garrison gladly capitulated, and thus Florence again became mistress of that city. This acquisition occasioned such joy in Florence, that public diversions were celebrated on that account. The Florentines then possessed themselves of the Arezzian territory, and of the fortresses which were held by the fons of Saco, their ancient tyrant. But a great revolution now took place in Italy.

jou,

Great power of Milan.

A. D.

1386.

JOHN VISCONTI, the fon of Galeazzo, a young man of disguised ambition, had now thrown off the mask, the dute of and had deprived his uncle Barnabo of his life and the principality of Milan. The Florentines, who had rather dreaded than loved Barnabo, at first beheld his fate with indifference; but afterwards they began to think that the young Galeazza's power was too formidable. In order to check him, the Flarentines did all they could to renew their union with the other states of Tuscany. In the mean while, Charles, king of Naples and Hungary, died, to the great mortification of Florence. A difference arose between the prince of Urbino and the duke of Gaetta, which the Florentines endeavoured to make up; but the prince of Urbino having, in defiance of the Florentine mediation, made himself master of his antagonist's person, the Florentines declared war against him; and carried it on with so much success, that he was at last reduced to reason. year the Florentines likewise recovered Liciano, a town in the Arezzian territory, that had for some time been in the posfession of the Siennese. About the year 1386, pope Urban came from Genea to Lucca, where he began to raise soldiers, to the vast terror of the Tuscan states, who held the papal tyranny in the utmost detestation: all but Perugia submitted itself to his power. The Florentines, in vain, exhorted the Perugians to stand by their liberties, and demolished a great number of fortresses towards the foot of the Appennines, which they could not maintain, left they should be seized by their Those fortresses belonged to the family of Ubaldini, the head of whom, John Azzo, began now to make a great figure in Italy, and was dreaded by the Florentines. commotions did not divert the attention of the Florentines from their domestic concerns; for we are told, that this year the area before their public palace was enlarged and beautified.

CIVIL

CIVIL diffentions succeeded. The Alberti family was now Alberti the most powerful in Florence, and Benedict Alberti was its banished. head. He had been elected gonfalonier of the city companies; and his fon Magaloti, a sprightly young nobleman. had been chosen gonfalonier of justice; so that the two principal posts in the state were vested in one family. magistrates voted Magaloti incapable of the office to which he had been chosen, on account of his youth; and substituted Berdo Mancini in his place. Not contented with this, they banished Benedict Alberti out of Florence; a disgrace which he bore with vast magnanimity. His banishment was followed by numberless acts of injustice inflicted upon his friends and family. The fear of Galeazzo of Milan now engroffed the attention of Florence. He was encouraged by the civil diffentions of the citizens, and by his own good fortune, which had already rendered him master of Verona and Vicenza, to attempt the mastery likewise of all Tuscany. The Florentines opposed him; but the Siennese were inclined to submit to his power. The people of Cortona were then under the protection of the Siennele; but perceiving their inclinations for Galeazzo, they applied to the Florentines, who were 6 generous as to refuse the government of their city; but fent them some troops to protect their independency. exasperated the Siennese so much, that they privately treated with Galeazzo about the furrender of their city to him. Gio-Danger of vanni Ricci, a noble Florentine, endeavoured to rouze his Florence. countrymen to a sense of their danger, by painting Galeazzo in his true colours, and laying open at once his power and ambition. He then advised them to enter into a league with the Bolognese, and as many of the Tuscan states as they could tring over to the party of freedom and independency, and to folicit assistance from the French, who, he said, were uneasy at the great power of Galeazzo in Italy. Above all, he counselled them to make new levies, and to be on their guard at home. Ricci's speech was approved of, his countrymen followed his advice, as far as it was prac-Even the Siennese now made some overtures for reewing their ancient league with Florence; and some meawere taken for carrying the war into Lombardy, and for lowing Pavia, then befreged by Galeazzo. But that scheme to great for the power of the confederates, and came to thing; so that Pavia sell into Galeazzo's hands. This did not prevent the negociation from going forward where the Florentines and the Siennese; but it was thwarted Galeazzo, who fought to make himfelf master of Polenza. Be Polenzans were then under the protection of the Siennese;

M

Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

but having an insuperable aversion to Galeazzo, they offer The Flor admit a Florentine garrison into their city. did not readily comply with this proposal, being afraid obliging the Siennese; but the Polenzan deputies formall before the magistrates of Florence, when they were affer in their town-house, and demanded that Polenza sho enrolled in their public inventory, as part of the Fla property, which was accordingly done; and thereby I being annexed to the dominion of Florence, could not be rated from it without consent of the people. highly disgusted the Siennese, who now courted the frie of Galeazzo, and complained that the Florentines had c them out of a city.

Courage and con-Hancy of tines.

This neither discouraged nor disconcerted the Flora They entered into an alliance with Barnabo's fon, and nio prince of Verona, who had both of them been dispose the Floren- by Galeazze. He, on the other hand, complained th Florentines fostered and supported his enemies, and dre the natives of Florence out of his dominions; while th rentines, with a magnanimity peculiar to a free state, open proclamation, inviting all Galeazzo's subjects to in their city and territory. At the same time they ser bassadors to France, to make a league with the French and ordered their general Hawkwood to march to Lon to the assistance of Barnabe's son and his party.

Peace concluded,

PETER GAMBACURTA was then the l man at Pila, but a strong advocate for peace. rity in Tuscany was so great, that the states of Milan, F. Sienna, and Perugia, entered into a league at Pisa. at this time that pope Urban VI. died, and was succeed Boniface, though the schism in the popedom still con-It foon appeared that Galeazzo had entered into the league, which was to last three years, for private ends own. His great view was against Florence; but to ke other parties of the confederacy either upon his fide or n he took occasion to upbraid the Florentines with a against his life, and mentioned the public speech Ri made as a proof of his allegation. He then drove : Florentines out of his dominions. They, on the other not bearing to be branded with fuch a calumny, wrote states of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, to clear themselves, lay open Galeazzo's wicked purposes. This incident of ratify it.

but broken. certed the league, and the Siennese and Perugians refu The Florentines, upon this, applied to Gamb who, having been fincere in all his proceedings, offered in person to Galeanso; but was dissuaded by the Flore for fear the latter should take advantage of Gambacurta's abfence to seize Pisa. The Florentines strove to renew their league with the Siennesse and the Perugians, and offered even to resign Polenza to the sormer; but they proved quite inractable, complaining, that their deputies had been sorced by Sir John Hawkwood to enter into the Pisan consederacy. The Perugians, in like manner, complained that the Florenties had harboured and entertained their exiles, and that they had endeavoured to seduce some of their towns.

THE Florentines had ordered deputies to repair to France, is Ricci had advised them; but they were intercepted, and detained by Galeazzo. The French king, however, hearing of this, sent ambassadors to the Florentines, offering to take them into his protection upon two conditions. The first was, that they should acknowledge the authority of pope Clement; and the other, that they should pay him an annual sum for his protection.

Though the Florentines were upon the eve of a war with The the most ambitious and powerful prince in Italy, though they French were surrounded by open or secret enemies, and though they demands had not an ally whom they could trust, yet they magnation and mediation with rejected those terms, as inconsistent with the good that and dignity of their state. They even carried their refeatment so far, that they resuled to accept the mediation of France for a peace, when her ambassadors proposed it. This negociation being at an end, Galeazzo sent a letter to Florence, containing a formal denunciation of war against the Florentines, who, he said, were held in subjection by a pragmatical Saelph saction. The Florentines recriminated upon him in a most severe manifesto they published, laying open all his times and ambition; and thus the war, which was the greatest the Florentines had ever undertaken, commenced in the star 1390.

SECT. VII.

Containing the History and Progress of the War between Milan and Florence. Hawkwood recalled out of Naples, and again made the Florentine General. The Florentines raise Men in France. Negotiation between them and the Duke of Bavaria, and several states of Italy. The noble Actions of Sir John Hawkwood. The Florentines vistorious. A truce concluded, which was soon broken. The Florentines rentines renew their Confederacy with other States. Death of Peter Gambacurta, and of the famous Sir John Hawkwood. Ten Field Deputies, or Prefiden:s of War, chosen at Florence for continuing the War. The Florentines assist the Lucquese. Milan erested into a Dukedom. The Milanese repulsed at Segni. Conspiracy at Florence. The Venetians confederate with the Florentines. The State of Italy in the Year 1400.

ing flate of

THE Florentine a historian observes, that, at the time we now treat of, the republic of Florence was in a most flou-Florence. rishing condition, both as to the state of her finances and the abilities of her subjects. Before the war was proclaimed, the Milancse, the Siennese, and the other enemies of Florence, rendezvoused near Sienna, to the number of three thousand horse and fifteen hundred foot, under the command of Giovanni Azzo, of the family of Ubaldini, and Jantedesco, a grandson of Saco, both of them determined enemies of Florence. Having for some time disguised their intentions by marches and countermarches, they all of a sudden passed Monte Luco, with a defign to seize upon San Giovanni, within which they had fome confederates. Being disappointed in their attempt, they marched towards Arezzo, ravaging the country all the way. The Florentines sent what forces they could spare to protect Arezzo; but the descendants of Saco were so powerful in that territory, that they became masters of Liciano, a place now fcarcely to be met with in maps.

Steadfast-Bolognele.

THE Bolognese continued faithful in their alliance with the ness of the Florentines; and Galeazzo marched an army against them, under the command of Giacomo Vermi of Verona, who took some places in the Bolognese. The people of Bologna immediately advertised the Florentines of their danger; and though the latter were in equal danger themselves, they ordered Sir John Hawkwood, who commanded their troops in Naples, to their affishance. At the same time, they invited Rainoldo Ursini, a general of great renown, to take the command of their troops in Tuscany; and ordered new levies to be made in the Campagna di Roma, also in the territories of the church, and all over Italy, where men would enlift in their service. In the mean while, Galeazzo, who, by Machiavel, is called John Galeaze Visconti, count of Virtue, died at Sienna, of a discase be had contracted in the field. His death introduced a new face of affairs all over Italy. Rainaldo Ursini accepted of the invitation of the Florentines; but while he was upon his march to take upon him the command of their troops, he was treacherously killed at Aquila; so that the chief command devolved upon Hawkwood. He had marched with great expedition from Naples to Bologna, and found himself at the head of four thousand horse and two thousand soot, Florentines and Bolognese. He immediately marched against the enemy. who were belieging Pramalcore; but, upon his approach, they retired into the Modenese with precipitation. They were purfued by Hawkwood, who retook the places which the Bolognesc had loft.

THE Florentines at this time meditated a far greater enter- The Floprize than any they had ever yet undertaken. Charles Vif- rentines conti, the fon of Barnabo, who thought himself the lawful attempt the heir of Milan, and Lucino, a prince of the same family, served conquest of under Hawkwood; and the Florentines, apprehended that it would not be impracticable to form a party against the reigning family at Milan. This project. flattered the high ideas they entertained of their own power and dignity; but they prudently fought to strengthen themselves by foreign al-They therefore sent a splendid deputation to Stephen duke of Bavaria, inviting him to march into Italy, and tempting him with a promise of a vast subsidy, and other advantages. They likewise invited the prince of Carrara, whose father had been imprisoned by Galeazzo, and who himself was then an exile in Germany, to return and affert his family-rights in Italy; and applied to several other foreign princes for affistance.

THE war was all this time raging with great fury in Tuf- Arezzo cany, where the Siennese and their allies became masters, by invaded. treachery, of a strong place called Battifolle, within three miles of Arezzo. By this they were rendered very formidable to that city. It happened, luckily for the Florentines, that the Arezzians themselves had an invincible aversion to the samily of the Tarleti, or Sace; and therefore, without putting the Flarentines to great expence, they made a most admirable desence, though they were surrounded on all hands by their enemies, who had found means to possess themselves of their fortreffee. The Florentines themselves acted with as much spirit, in expectation of the affistances they had solicited from Germany and France; so that all Tuscany was at this time engaged in a war, so expensive to the Florentines, that sew sovereign states could have defrayed it, they having subsidies to pay to almost all the neighbouring princes. The Germans М 3

comes to the Florentines; duke of Bavaria.

were very poor, and their fuccess was therefore the great The prince that country. The prince of Carrara arrived in Italy a of Carrara head of a large body of German horse, and marched with dispatch, that he surprised Padua; but the citadel hel the aid of for John duke of Milan, the eldest son of Galeazzo. fame time Hawkwood, having secured the state of $B\iota$ marched through the Modenese, and laid siege to Reggi as does the Parma, while the duke of Bavaria arrived with a fresh of Germans; so that the family of Galeazzo was in dan lofing all its possessions in Lombardy, excepting Milan. pears, from the concurring testimony of all historians the scheme the Florentines had now laid for the conqu Lombardy must have succeeded, had they not unfortu been obliged to commit the execution of it to German n The Veronese had taken arms for the infant naries. Antonio, their late prince; but not being supported, as expected to be, by the duke of Bavaria, the Galeazzo had regained the ascendent: and the Vicenza was we posed to revolt; but was obliged to submit to the same p for want of a head.

Apolog y and demands of the latter.

THE duke of Bavaria, on the other hand, in an er he fent to Florence, laid all the blame of his failure upo obstructions he received from the duke of Austria, the of Aquileia, and the Venetians; but pretended that h come time enough to fave Padua, where the citadel still He counselled the Florentines, at the same time, der Hawkwood, who was still in Lonbardy with his arn join him; but the drift of his whole message was for a Supply of money. The Florentines replied, that his was ridiculous and impracticable, and his demand unr able: that the citadel of Padua was no object for two armies, such as his and Hawkwood's, to be employed as that the prince of Carrara was at the head of a force cient to reduce it: that the swelling of the two great the Po and the Adige, rendered it impracticable for Hau to join him: that, if he intended to do them any fervio ought immediately to march against Verona and Vicena which case they would take his demand into consider though he knew that they had paid him already all the 1 they had promised, which was sufficient for defraving the pence of a far greater army than he had brought with

This answer disobliged and disconcerted the needy of the Flo-man so much, that he refused to move from Padua; wh Bolognese horse mutinying for want of pay, Hawkwee obliged to carry them and his Florentine troops back 1 Bolognese; and thus fell to the ground the vast and toncerted project of the Florentines for the conquest of Lambordy. His retreat revived the spirits of the Galeazzo party there; and they assembled a great force to relieve the castle of Padua, and retake the town. The Bavarian foresaw the difficulties of the Florentines, and pretended to make preparations for returning home. At last the Florentines submitted to pay him some money, provided he would remain at Padua. Their perplexities were great on this occasion. They plainly saw that the Bavarian was not to be trusted, and that Padua could be saved only by their own troops. They had an army on soot; but the duke of Ferrara resused to let it pass through his territories, and it being in no condition to sorce its way, the Florentines applied for shipping to the Venetians, who denied them, on account of their connections with the Galeazzo samily.

THE affairs of the Florentines wore a better aspect in Tus- War in cary, where the Milanese had now few or no troops. Their Tuscany. generals were Donati Azarolo, a Florentine nobleman, and Biliotto Biliotti; and they gained several advantages over the This brought many of the latter to think of departing from their league with the Galeazzo family. Hawkwood, all this time, lay with his army amongst the Bolognese, who were now heartily tired of the war. They therefore sent ambassadors a to Florence, pleading their inability to con- Embassy tinue it, on account of its expence; and demanding either a from the loan of money, or leave to make a separate peace. The Flo-Bologrentines reproached the ambassadors with the pusillanimity of nese. their countrymen; represented the prodigious sums they had expended in the war, the near prospect they had of success: and concluded by telling them, the peace they talked of could be no other than a bargain for flavery. This magnanimous answer so much stung the Bolognese, that they resolved to continue the war with more vigour than ever. The effect of this resolution was soon seen, by a peace that was concluded between them and Alberti of Ferrara; by which the latter agreed to give the Florentine army a free passage to Padua, which was now in the most imminent danger.

The great merit of Sir John Hawkwood appears from the The high following confideration, that though he was a foreigner, and worth of now very aged; and though the Florentine nobility had all, in Sir John their turns, aspired to be generals, and many of them had Hawkbeen intrusted with the command of armies; yet Hawkwood was always, as it were, the sheet-anchor of their state in all junctures of difficulty and danger, and the greatest of their nobility then submitted to his command. He was, or occasion, sent to relieve Padua, the duke of Bavaria now returned to Germany. Hawkwood arrived but ji time to save the city; for his enemies, though very nume would not stand a battle. This service being performed marched towards Verona and Vicenza, in hopes of beir voured by some commotions in those cities; but the di Milan had taken his measures so well, by bridling them strong garrisons, that he was disappointed, and obliged to up his winter-quarters in the Paduan. Such were the actions of the year 1301.

e ARETIN, p. 213.

The French
affift the Florentines.

THE return of the duke of Bavaria to Germany, in the Florentines to apply to the French (who may then t to be a free people) with more eagerness than ever for ance. The French nobility were at this time very pendent of their king, and had been long practifed in The count de Armignac was one of the most illus amongst them, and to him the Florentines particularly at He readily listened to their proposals, and the fate of bardy was once more rendered doubtful. It was agreed, the count should penetrate into Lombardy, with a great by the way of Alessandria, while Hawkwood should ma his ground in the Paduan; and that, both armies being i they should attack Milan. Giovanni Ricci and Rainolde filiacci were at this time the Florentine deputies with the who met with great difficulties in his undertaking. Ga had spared neither money nor pains to raise a party again expedition at the court of Rome, and a mutiny in his The count, however, furmounting all opposition, beginning march at the head of a very fine army, which foon paff Alps, keeping the Appennines on the right hand, and t on the left. The Florentine deputies, during this march, was undertaken to avoid the uncertain passages over th fino, the Po, and several other rivers, were at great p: curb the natural impetuosity of the French, who were tually falling out amongit themselves, and undertaking gerous but useless expeditions.

GALEAZZO, more terrified at the French tha Florentines, having provided for the defence of Milan, 1 to Pavia, where he took up his head quarters, and fe flower of his troops to oppose the French, and to ga Alessandria. By this time Hawkwood became master the open country of the Milanese, which he laid under contributions; but being unprovided of engines, or art it is probable that he took no strong places, and h

Hawkwood master of the Milanese. obliged to flop at the river Adda, which he could not pass. This was within fixteen miles of Milan.

GALEAZZO, being thus beset by the French and Flo- The rentine armies, was about to have abandoned Pavia, when he French, was encouraged to stand on the defensive by the prodigious thre' their heats of the feason, it being then the middle of July, and the own imgreat imprudence of the French. For, after taking Caffelati, prudence, which is within fix miles of Aleffandria, they dismounted from are totally their horses, which were almost rendered unserviceable by the deseated. intense heats, and advanced in a square battalia of foot against the city, which had an army for its garrison. The Florentine historian b justly observes, that this disposition would have been successful, had the French been to meet their enemies in the field; but the Milanese kept within their walls and entrenchments; and observing that the French had left their horses at a great distance behind them, they sallied out at a different gate from that which the French were to attack, and This frantic conduct proved the utter took the horses. ruin of the French. Galeazzo mounted his troops on horseback, and attacked them on all fides. Their valour proved of no service to them, as they could not pursue their enemies, who attacked and retired at pleasure; while the French, thro' their own weakness, occasioned by the heats of the weather and their fatigues, were unable to purfue. In short, scarcely a Frenchman escaped. Many of them were killed, more of them perished through heat and fatigue, and those who furvived were made prisoners. Amongst the latter were the Florentine deputies. As to the count of Armignac, being disabled and made prisoner, he died in a few hours, rather from the anguish of his mind than the severity of his wound. Aretin says, that, by the public accounts of Florence, it appears that this expedition cost the Florentines, in a very few months, one million two hundred and fixty thousand ducats.

GALEAZZO, having gained so compleat and unex. Hawkpected a victory, marched now against Hawkwood, who, not wood debeing certain of the truth, did no more than fall back to a feats the little distance from the Adda, and encamped at Paterno, a vil-villors. lage in the Cremonese. The Milanese advanced with all the confidence of a fure victory, while Hawkwood ordered his troops to lie in their camp upon the defensive. The Milanese imputed this caution to fear, and for four days infulted his camp; but Hawkwood, taking advantage of their security and want of discipline, at last gave them battle, and defeated them; a great number being killed in the field, and above twelve hundred of their cavalry, with some of their chief officers, taken prisoners. Notwithstanding this defeat, the Milanese were greatly superior to him in strength, and hung upon his rear in his retreat, till he came to the river Oglio, which was difficult to pass in sight of a superior army; but he furmounted even this difficulty, by the help of four hundred English archers he had under him, who passed the river, and covered the rest of the Florentine army, in passing it, under the discharge of their arrows. This retreat was, in those days, justly thought to be a master-piece of generalship; and Hawkwood, without any farther interruption, palled the Mincio.

His admirable retreat.

> His difficulties, however, were greatly increased when he came to the banks of the Adige, which the enemy had broken down, and thereby laid the adjacent country under water; but Hawkwood relieved his army, even in this dreadful fituation. He marched through the shoal-waters, and came to a rifing ground, where he pitched his tents; which leaving standing, to deceive the enemy, he marched forward to Montagnana, a friendly town, where he passed the Adige in boats. Aretin observes, that no general but Hawkwood could have performed such a retreat, which proved him to be the ablest commander of that age.

Expedition against Sienna.

THE prodigious losses and difficulties the Florentines had fultained, during this campaign, was far from abating their military ardour; for, during their expedition into Lombardy, they sent Ludovico Campano, with an army of four thousand horse and two thousand foot, amongst whom were twelve hundred Genoese cross-bowmen, against Sienna. They began their march towards the end of autumn, when the Siennese, who were perishing by famine, expected to get in their harvest. This induced the Florentines to prolong their march as much. as possible, that they might render the neighbourhood of Sienna a desert; so inveterate was their hatred towards the Siennese. In the mean while, they took several places in that territory, and made many of the principal Siennese prisoners. But while they now thought themselves secure of subduing all # their enemies, they received intelligence that the French had been totally defeated at Alessandria, and Hawkwood surrounded :on the banks of the Adda, without a possibility of retreating. Those dismal accounts checked all the towering hopes of the Florentines, who imagined that Galeazzo was already in the heart of Tuscany. They recovered, however, from their consternation, when they heard that Hawkwood and his army were fafe, and they fent him orders to march directly to Tufcany. While he was upon his march, Galeazzo fent Vermi of Verona, at the head of his army, to the affistance of the Siennese, and he arrived at Pisa about the time that Hawkwood reached Bologna. The Florentine army which remained Hawkin the Siennese must have been destroyed, and Florence itself wood perhaps taken, had it not been for the courage and activity faves Flo. of the old English general, who, hearing of Vermi's expedi-rence. tion, immediately passed the mountains, marched to Pistoia, and from thence to San Miniato, in the neighbourhood of the Milanofe army, and offered them battle. Vermi at that time declined it, and marched from Pisa to Volterra, and from thence to Sienna, both to cover that city and to join the Siennese troops, which were still in the field. This junction being effected, the whole of his army amounted to ten thousand horse and three thousand mercenary foot, besides a great body of Pisan and Siennese volunteers; and with this formidable force he entered the Florentine territory.

THE Florentine generals and officers, upon this, held a great The Flocouncil of war in Boneti. They had two generals, Sir John rentines Hawkwood and Luigi Campano, who had commanded their recover army in Tuscany. Their troops, in point of discipline and courage, were equal if not superior to those of the enemy; but their numbers were far inferior. It was therefore resolved in a council of war to act upon the defensive, and in detached parties, and to keep their strong places always at their backs. This was a wife refolution. They knew their allies were on their march to join them, and that the Siennese territory could not long support their enemy. After many marches and countermarches on both fides, both armies encamped within two miles of each other on the banks of the Tessino. While they lay in this situation, the Florentines were joined by count Barbiani, at the head of three thousand Bolognese horse and four hundred archers, and by several other auxiliary troops. This accession of strength, and the numbers daily flocking to them from Arezzo, and the neighbouring country, rendered the Florentines equal to their enemies, and both fides seemed to prepare in good earnest for a general engagement.

This, however, was only a feint on the part of the Mi-and beat lanese, who had already resolved upon a retreat, which they their emperformed in the night towards Victolini. Passing the moun-mies. tains in the neighbourhood, they lest troops to guard the passes in case of a pursuit, while the main body held on their march. The Florentines no sooner heard of their enemy's retreat, than their camp was in an uproar, from the eagerness of the soldiers for a pursuit, all of them calling out that not a man of the run-a-ways ought to be suffered to escape.

Nothing

0

Nothing but Hawkwood's great authority could have diverted them from this pernicious resolution. He strenuously insisted on their enemy's being suffered to retreat, and of the danger and folly of pursuing them through a country fo fit for ambuscades. It was with the utmost difficulty his advice at last prevailed; and fending out parties to reconnoitre, it was difcovered that part of the enemy was embarked on the banks of the Novela, and that part were still in possession of the mountains. Hawkwood immediately gave orders that the latter should be attacked, which, notwithstanding their strong fituation, was performed with fuch vigour, that they were driven from the passes into the plain, with the loss of three hundred killed, and two hundred horsemen made prisoners, amongst whom were some officers of the highest distinction. particularly Taddeo Vermi, brother to the Milanese general; a great number of foot were made prisoners at the same time. This victory served only to render the Florentines more prefumptuous; and descending from the hill, against the express command of Hawkwood, they attacked the rear of the enemy in the plain; but were repulsed with some loss, which rendered them a little more tractable.

A negotiation for peace.

AFTER this, the Milanese army proceeded on their march, and the Florentines took possession of the camp they left, greatly exulting at the cowardly flight, as they called it, of their enemies. The latter, however, far from flying, proceeded no farther than Serezana, in the Lucquese; and, turning short, they marched to Cascino, in the territory of Pile, in the neighbourhood of which they encamped, and gave out that they were returned to fight the Florentines., The latter had thought themselves so secure, that their auxiliaries were on their march homewards, but were foon recalled. Many of them, however, did not return; so that both armies, after lying some weeks within fight of one another, departed, without fighting, into winter-quarters. During this campaign the Florentines besieged Ranco, a strong sortres in the Arezzian territory, belonging to Saco's family. But the place proving impregnable, both parties grew tired of the war and inclined to peace. Friends interpoling for that purpose, Genoa was pitched upon for the place of negotiation: and the Florentines fent thither their plenipotentiaries, as Ga-Leazzo and the pope, who was greatly for peace, did theirs. = The chief difficulty regarded the captive prince of Carrarge = whose deliverance his son Francisco insisted upon; as Galeazzo did upon the rendition of Padua. Some difficulties likewise : occurred with regard to the Siennese exiles, who had taken refuge at Florence, and the town of Liciano. At last, after various various altercations, the matter was referred to the arbitration of the pope's legate, and the doge of Genoa, and, by way of compliment, a deputy from the people of Genoa. Those referrees having agreed upon their award, demanded who was to be guarantee of the peace. "The sword, briskly replied Tomassi, one of the Florentine deputies; Ga-"leazzo and Florence now know each other's strength." This gallant speech was approved of by Galeazzo's party, and award was then pronounced to the following effect:

That the town of Padua, with all the places taken by Its terms. Francisco prince of Carrara, should remain to him, upon his paying to Galeazzo fifty thousand ducats in five years time. Hopes were likewise given him, tho' nothing on that head was expressly stipulated, that Galeazzo would, of his own accord, restore the old prince to his liberty. All the places which the Florentines and the Siennesse had taken from each other, were to be restored to their original owners, except Liciano, which was referred to a future negotiation; and the Siennesse, as well as the Paduan, exiles were to be restored to their estates. It was likewise stipulated, that Galeazzo's army should not pass a certain boundary towards Florence, unless the Siennesse or the Perugians should invite them as auxiliaries against the unjust attacks of the Florentines.

Nothing in this treaty was so much sound fault with as Partiality the money which was to be paid for Padua, and which the of the Ge-Plorentines, it seems, were to advance. Aretin a observes, noese, that, during the whole negotiation, the Genoese discovered a visible partiality for Galeazzo; and even forced the grand mater of Rhodes, who was the pope's legate, to yield some points in his savour. The Florentines in the main, however, were well satisfied with the terms.

THE war between Milan and Florence had, immediately or Galeazremotely, affected the tranquility of all Italy, and every state 20's infinin it earnestly wished for not only the return but the conti-cerity, Buance of peace. For this reason it had been stipulated, in the late negotiation at Genoa, that, when the Milanese and Florentine armies were dishanded, effectual means should be pursed to prevent the soldiers from forming themselves into companies of banditti, or robbers; an evil which had often been stal to the repose of Italy. This was proposed to be done by not dishanding the troops all at once, but gradually; and by the respective parties keeping in their service such leaders as were most capable of heading and conducting such bands.
The Florentine historian betells us, that his countrymen and their allies were fincere in performing this engagement; but that Galeazzo's mercenaries formed themselves into a body, and demanded a passage through the Bolognese and the Ferrarese. The Florentines, who perhaps refined a little too much upon events, suspected that Galeazzo had connived at this demand, and sent some troops to the assistance of the Bolognese, who had refused to comply with it. Upon this, the companies marched through the Parmesan towards Tuscany, and advanced to the Siennese, their strength every day encreasing. They then began to harrass and lay under contribution the inhabitants of Tuscany.

Pag. 221. ARETIN, ibid.

and injustice.

THE Florentines were extremely uneasy at those proceedings, especially as it now appeared that neither the Siennesse nor Galeazzo were their cordial friends. The former took every opportunity to express their rancour against Florence, and the latter behaved in a manner that was equally mean and brutal. Giovanni Ricci, who had made the famous speech against Galeazzo, and one of the Florentine deputies who had attended the count de Armignac, had been made prisoner at Alessandria; and, after the peace of Genoa, Galeazzo not only raised his demand of four thousand florins for his ranfom to thirty thousand, but put him in irons; and fent two of his courtiers to tell him, that though he deferved death, yet he would remit that punishment upon the payment of the money. This was a fum so impossible for Ricci to raile, that his punishment amounted to perpetual imprisonment. Galeazzo, at the same time, resused to restore the old prince of Carrara to his freedom, and omitted no means to make the young one uneasy in his possession of Padua, by entertaining and succouring the Paduan exiles.

The Florentines renew their league.

SUCH a variety of suspicious circumstances put the Florence tines upon their renewing their ancient league with their neighbouring states, which they did at Bologna. The part ties who came into the confederacy were, besides the Florent tines and the Bolognese, the Paduans and the Ferrarese; but liberty was referved for any other state to enter into the confederacy, which the Mantuans soon after did. This confederacy is a fresh proof of the passion for liberty, which the Italian states cherished in those days, and the wife measures they pursued to preserve it. It however gave great umbrage to Galeazzo, who, in his turn, publicly complained that Florentines never had been fincere in the peace they had concluded with him, and he accordingly made preparations f renewing the war with more vigour than ever; but, to gain. time he named ambassadors previously to treat with the Florrentines.

EVERY

EVERY page of the Florentine history produces instances of Their the glory attending the encouragement of commerce amongst preat a free people. Florence had in a manner supported, on her riches and own shoulders, the liberty of Tuscany; and had just finished, magnific with honour, a most expensive and ruinous war with the cence. greatest prince in Italy. She had paid immense subsidies to the princes both of Germany and France, without being benefited by them, and irreproachably fulfilled all the engagements she had entered into: she was dreaded, hated, and envied by many of the neighbouring states, against whom the was obliged to keep armies on foot to guard against their surprizes; and yet she continued so immensely rich, that her citizens, at this time, outvied those of all Europe, in the splendor and elegance of their equipages, in their manner of living, in their buildings and public exhibitions. While they every day expected to re-enter into a bloody and expensive war with Galeazzo, they were celebrating tilts and tournaments, in honour of the birth of the French king's eldest son, with a magnificence that amazed all Europe. From the description their historian c has given us of those diversions, it is plain that they were intended as an imitation of the Trojan games, so finely described by Virgil, and common amongst the Romans, who were the patterns of the Florentine policy, both in peace and war; but with this advantage in favour of the latter, that they were a commercial state.

AFTER this magnificent exhibition, Galeazzo's ambassadors Negotiacame to Florence, where, in a public audience, they highly tion with extolled their prince's good faith and good will towards the Galeazzo, Florentines, who answered them in terms equally polite and general. The ambaffadors had expected that the Florentines would have entered upon the subject of their complaints against their master; but being disappointed, they told the Florentines plainly, that their instructions were to enter upon particulars on three heads: that of the banditti, of the behaviour of the Siennese, and the detention of the old prince of Carrara and Ricci in prison. As to the first, they pretended that their mafter had done all that was in his power to prevent such illegal associations. With regard to the second, he faid, he was so far from encouraging the Siennese, that he had withdrawn his protection from them, to render them more tractable. With regard to the last head, they faid, it was no just subject of complaint, as nothing had been tipulated by the peace of Genoa: that the misbehaviour of the young prince of Carrara was the reason of his sather's detention; and that Ricci was the property of an officer, and whom Galeazzo could not force to deliver him up.

[·] ARETIN, pag. 222.

to wbom they send deputies.

THE Florentines affected great surprize at this speech, and denied they had given authority to any one to fay, that they had entertained any suspicions of Galeazzo's friendship. It appeared, however, afterwards, that the discovery had been made to him by the imprudence of a Florentine priest, who had been employed at his court. The Florentines, therefore, declined making any reply; and the ambassadors upbraided them with their having received the Mantuan, which lay, as it were, in the bosom of their master's dominions, into their To this last charge the Florentines replied, that the Mantuans were their ancient allies; and that, by admitting them into their league, they did no more than renew their former alliance with them; and that the whole of their confederacy was no other than defensive. As to the other parts of their commission, the Florentines informed them that they would fend a satisfactory answer to Galeazzo by deputies of their own. Three accordingly were chosen, Felippe Adimar, Rinaldo Gianfigliazzo, and Guide Tommafe; but an incident happened at this time very alarming to the Florentines.

Death of Gambacurta.

WE have, on several occasions, mentioned Peter Gambacurta, who had long the chief (way at Pi/a, and, by all accounts, was one of the worthiest men in his time. He had a secretary, Giacomo di Appiano, who had served him so long that he was let into all his affairs and fecrets; and being employed and trusted by his master in his most important concerns, he privately formed a faction against Gambacurta in favour of Galeazza, who supported him. In the late war Appiano had sent his son Vannes to serve under Galeazzo; and the vouth being taken prisoner, Galeazza valued him so much, that he exchanged Ricci for him. On the return of Vannes to Pija, their party openly declared themselves; and though Gambacurta was often forewarned of his fate, Appian found means to put him to death, and to feize upon the government². This resolution, so unfavourable for the Florentines, happened on the second of October, 1392, according to the Siemele annals, and retarded the departure of the Flarentine deputies. It was now plain, that the whole had been schemed and effected by Galeazzo, whose partizan Appiano professed himself to be. At last the deputies departed, and two or three years passed in a state of neither war nor peace between Galeazza and the Florentines; each was civil to the other, and each endeavoured to betray and outwit one another. We shall, therefore, lay hold of this interval to mention some particulars, which, though of importance to history, cannot properly be interwoven with the narrative of wars or civil transactions.

other,

Annali Sanefi apud Munatori, tom. xix. ad ann. 1392.

THE historian Leonard of Arezzo, whom we have all along Extraordimentioned by the name of Arctin, informs us b, that he was nary fit of at this time a young man studying the civil law, and there-enthusiasm. fore we may look upon him in some sense as a cotemporary author. From him we learn, that the Italians, and the Florentines in particular, had, for fome time, laid aside the use of arms, from the great conveniency they found in hiring and employing foreign troops, and that those foreigners were all of them cavalry. We mention this circumstance to account for the extraordinary exceeding of the cavalry over the infantry in all the Italian armies, which the reader meets with in almost every page of this history. He tells us, however, that at this time the practice of hiring foreign horsemen was entirely difused in Italy, and the Italian cavalry was every where preferred to the foreign. There might, notwithstanding, be a reason for this, which Arctin does not mention; we mean the other wars in which the other princes of Europe were now involved, by which they found employment in their own armies for all their men. This sudden change of character seems to have affected the common people of Tuscary in a most extraordinary manner. According to Aretin, nothing was to be seen all over the towns but long solemn procesfions of the inhabitants drest in white. All were wrapt up in the fervours of devotion. All animofities between one place and another were now forgot. Two full months were spent in those mutual peregrinations from town to town. They who before had been sworn enemies, now embraced each other as friends. All gates flew open, and all places were accessible at the approach of the white robed processionills. Love and friendship seemed to possels every breast, and the universal chorus was peace and pity. They who were the most forward in deriding the accounts of those extraordinary appearances, no sooner saw them than they seemed to be smitten with the contagion, and were the foremost in putting on white garments (A). The Florentines shared deep in

b Vide LEONARD! ARETINI rerum suo tempore in Italia gesta-

⁽A) In the printed copies of taken of a remarkable different detain's commentary notice is Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

N read-

in the common infection; and no fewer than four procel fions went out of their city, which was thereby left uninha-At last the contagion spread all over Italy; and, according to Aretin, no certain account could be given of it. rife.

The Florentines the revivers of learning.

THE revival of Greek learning at this period, after lying dead in Italy, according to Aretin, seven hundred years, does honour to the Florentine name. The emperor of Constantinople had come to Italy, to follicit affiftance against the Turk, and had in his train a noble Byzantine called Chrysoloras, tenowned for his knowledge of Greek learning. The Florentines, by a solemn deputation, invited this illustrious scholar to their city, where he was received with all the honours due to his rank and merit, and a falary was allowed him for opening a school for Greek lectures. Thus, to the immortal credit of the Florentines, Europe owes that invaluable acquisition to them. Aretin preferred the lectures of Chrysolaras to those of his law masters, and has given us a particular lift of his noble school sellows. Chrysoloras kept his school open for above two years; but was obliged to attend his mafter at Milan, being upon his return to Constantinople. While we are upon this subject, it is but justice to Florence, and the memory of Aretin, who was a subject of Florence, to mention that he may be confidered as the great reviver of classical Latin in Europe, and that no writer fince that time has exceeded his stile in purity and precision; nor were his countrymen ungrateful to his merit, for they raifed him to the greatest employments in their state.

wood.

THE Florentines, during the collation of their war with Gacharacter leazzo, admitted into the confederacy, of which they were of Hawk- the head, the inhabitants of Rimini, Faenza, Ravenna, Imla, and Citta di Castello. This enlargement of the confede racy was the more necessary, as the banditti, privately encouraged by Galeazzo, grew daily more and more formidable. But the Florentines, at this time, received an irrecoverable blow by the death of the great Sir John Hawkwood, which A. D. 1394. happened in the year 1394. All the Italian writers of this age, of whatever country or faction they were, agree, tha he was, at the time of his death, incomparably the greatel general in Italy, if not in Europe. He married the natura daughter of Barnabo duke of Milan, by whom he is faid to > reading it Et quasi Deo correpti, which signifies as if they have as if they had been seized by been seized by what we may God. Other copies read it, call a fit of madness. Et quasi æstro, ut dicitur, cotrepti, have received in portion a million of florins. Notwithstanding his foreign services, he never forgot that he was an Engbiliman; and it was through his means that the marriage between Guleuzzi's daughter and prince Lionel of England took place. Hillorians observe, that though Hawkwood died in extreme old age, it did not at all abate the vigour of his youth; for he shewed greater spirit, as well as generalship, in his last campaign, than he had done in any of his preteding. We cannot take leave of this great man without one observation, which is, that though he served various fiates, and in different interests, yet no imputation lies on his memory of being either mercenary or ungrateful; fo that his conduct is as irreproachable as a man, as it was great as a hero (B). After being the scourge he became the saviour of the Fiorentine liberty; and after his death he was, at the public expence, honoured with a noble funeral, and a magnificent monument.

AFTER the banishment of Alberti, factions prevailed in Civil fat-Florence, and many of his filends and party were either exiled. tions in admonished, or put to death, by what Machiavel' calls the Florence. Balia, which was an extraordinary power delegated, upon certain occasions, to the lords, the colleges, the eight, the captains of the wards, and the fyndics of the trades. Misso Albizi was an enemy to the house of Alberti, on account of the death of Pietro Albizi; and being gonfalonier of justice, he procured Alberto and Andrea Alberti, to be accused of holding a correspondence with the enemies of the state. This brought on a fresh prosecution of the Alberti party, in which fuch numbers of the lower ranks of the people were either admonished or put to death, that the multitude took arms. Part of them ran to the great square, where the magistrates were affembled, and forced them to give them for their leaders Rinaldo Gianfigliazzo, and Donato Acciaivoti, with the enfigns

* Vide Paul Jovius in Batnaba, pag. 159, and Barnes's Life of Edward III. pag. 718. b Vide Machiavel's Hifc Id. ibid. tory of Florence, book iii.

(B) He had a fon named John, born in Italy, made as appeareth by the record (1), tibus transmarinis.

Johannes, filius Johannis Haukewood, miles, natus in partibus knight and naturalized in the Italiæ factus indigena, ann. 8. Eventh year of king Henry IV. Hen. IV. mater ejus nata in parof the Guelphs and the people in their hands. Others ran to the house of Veri di Medici (C), and besought him to take upon him the government of the state, which he nobly refused; but told the people at the same time he would do them all the service he could. He accordingly repaired to the palace of the prefidents, whom, after clearing himself of all ambitious views, he exhorted to moderation. The magistrates, on their part, made so many fair professions, that Veri, upon his return to the people, persuaded them to lay down their arms. This gave time to the magistrates to arm two thoufand citizens, who they knew would stand by them; and they proceeded with the utmost severity against the late infurgents, many of whom they put to death, and admonished They were opposed by Donato Acciavoli, who, being too precipitate in pulling for the recal of the exiles, was convicted of practices against the state, and confined in prison. Many of the family of Medici, and their friends, were banished at the same time. The chief exiles, most of whom were sprightly young men, retired to Bologna; but we are now to attend the military affairs of Florence, which Machinvel has scarcely mentioned.

(1) In Bib. Cot. & in Arch, Turris Lond. 1. Pars Pat. An. 8. Hen. 1V. A. 20.

Affairs of Ferrara.

Upon the death of Alberto, prince of Ferrara, whose sa Nicholas at that time was very young, Azzo, who was near related to the family, was obliged by the tutors of the your prince to abandon Ferrara, and, after spending some time Venice he came to Florence, where he made a splendid appear ance. Leaving Florence at the head of some followers. being privately supported by Galeazzo, he marched to Romagna, where his party grew fo strong, that Nicholas in danger of being deposed. The Florentines mediated tween them; but finding Azzo intractable, they decid themselves guardians to Nicholas. Azzo was backed by inhabitants of Ravenna and Forli, and above all by co Barbiani, and continued to be underhand affisted by G azzo. Upon this the Florentines, perceiving a war was avoidable, raised an army, but before it could take the fi Brogla and Brandolino, at the head of some of the band in Azzo's pay, surprised the castle of Gargonza near Area This obliged the Florentines to divide their army. One's of it was detached to recover Gargonza, and another un a foreign count called Conrad was fent into the Ferrarefe,

(C) Aretin is filent as to the noble behaviour of Veri on this occasion; but Machiavel, whose twelve field deputies, (an office which had lain dormant ever fince the last peace) were appointed to attend their army. The Belognese had some connections with Azzo, which kept them neutral in this dispute.

WHILE those great preparations were in dependence, am-The Flobalisadors came from the emperor Winceslaus, son of the em-rentines peror Charles IV. offering the Florentines his assistance against jealous of Galeazzo, and to march in person into Italy for that purpose, the emsome of the Florentine allies, such as the Paduans and Man-peror. tuans, were eager for embracing the proposal; but the Florentines, ever true to the maxims of independency, were shy of giving an emperor of Germany any sooting in Italy. They therefore prevailed with their allies to decline the emperor's offer, under the pretext that they were then negotiating a peace with the Milanese, and that if it should not succeed, they would accept of his generous assistance. In the mean time they entered into a negotiation with the French king, as being the less dangerous ally, in order to secure their independency against Galeazzo.

WE now arrive at the year 1395, when the Ferrarese and the Arezzian wars were still continued by the Florentines, and both of them underhand fed and supported by Galeazzo. But all of a sudden he recalled the troops serving in the Arezzian territories, and very politically prevailed with those who had surprised Gargonza to render it back to the Florentines. As to the Ferrarese war, Aretin informs us of an extraordinary incident, which, was it not attested by so great an authority as his is, we should not have inserted. He tells, that count Barbiani, the great protector and support of Azzo, the pretender to the dukedom of Ferrara, was prevailed upon by the promise of a vast sum of money, and the surrender of two or three important places, to murder Azzo. But it seems he drest up a person, who nearly resembled Azzo, in his cloaths; and having killed him, he received the reward. Soon after the real Azzo appeared to the great merriment of the public. This foul attempt upon Azzo's life did some service to his cause; but Astorgi of Faenza joining the Florentines against him, count Conrad, the Florentine general, took him prisoner, and he was confined at Faenza.

AZZO being no longer dreaded, the Florentines, who had The Flobeen greatly provoked by the insolence of Barbiani, besieged rentines him in one of his own castles. But the prosperous state of the give um-Florentine affairs had, by this time, excited the jealousy of brage to their allies. The inhabitants of Bologna, Ravenna, and Imo-their neighbla, openly threatened to renounce their alliance, if they pro-bours. ceeded to farther conquests in their neighbourhood, or to as-

A. D.

fift

 N_3

fift either Aftergi or Nicholas of Ferrara. The flege of Luco, however, a place belonging to Barbiani, still went on, when Alberico Barbiani, his relation, and Galeazzo's general, undertook to relieve the place. Galeazzo made a polite apology to the Florentines for his general's conduct, and they procured the fiege to be discontinued. They, however, laid fiege to Castrocari, a town which had belonged to the Roman fee, and had been fold to the Fiorentines by the pope's general (a traffic not uncommon in those days) but treacherously detained by him after receiving the money. The Bolognese again interposed, as did the inhabitants of Forli, and indeed all the Romagna and the neighbouring states, where the #lorentines had now no friends but Aftergi of Facnza. rentine historian himself a secons to give up the Florentines on this occasion, and to condemn their undertaking the siege of Castrocari, which made all the states of Italy, even the Venetians, their enemies. At last, by friendly interpositions, matters were compromised and lest to the arbitration of Francisco of Carrara.

They Support Lucca. In the mean while Appiana, who was now the governing man in Pisa, attempted to reduce Lucca to his obedience; upon which the Florentines sent a body of troops to Pescia, which is but ten miles from Lucca, and a deputy to the Lucquese, to exhort them to maintain their independency. The Lucquese, sensible of this generous interposition, admitted the Florentine troops into their city, and drove the besiegers from their works; upon which the friendship was renewed between the Florentines and the Lucquese, and the Pisans were detested by both.

Commotions in Florence.

ACCIAIVOLI, a noble Florentine, after various revolutions of power in that city, was now at its head. He had long concurred in the general maxims of the state; but all of a sudden he savoured the exiles and the admonished, and joined with Angelo, the gonsalonier's son, in a project to restore and recapacitate them to enjoy public honours. Their schemes being made known to the magistrates, all of them so one man joined to deseat them; and Acciaivoli, with his accomplices, were sent into exile. This amazing reverse of fortune, with regard to a man who, but a sew days before, was little less than sovereign of the Florentine state, is a strong proof how tenacious the Florentines were then of their liberties. Their severity was the more remarkable, as Acciaivali was a citizen of irreproachable morals, both in public and private life; and no charge was brought against him but the great credit he had in the state, which his fellow-citizens thought incompatible with the name of a free government. Along with him were banished many other popular citizens. both noble and ignoble, so that at least one half of the Florentine people were at this time deemed exiles.

THIS year Galeazzo obtained from the emperor of Ger-Milan many, who pretended to be lord paramount of Milan, the erected into title of duke, having before that time been designed only a dutchy. count of Virtue, which was his patrimonial inheritance. He formally fignified to the Florentines his new accessions of honours, and they in complaifance celebrated festivities upon it. But those appearances of joy were checked in the beginning of the year 1306, when the exiles and the banditti invaded the Arezzian territory with fire and fword: They were foon joined by Barbiani, the sworn enemy of the Florentines, with a great force. The Florentines knew that Barbiani's troops were mercenaries, and wifely refolved to deal with them as They offered money to their two leaders, Cantelli and Filippo of Pisa, and thereby prevailed with them to leave Barhan's service, and to enter into theirs. We are not autho- Views of rized upon the face of history to say what the secret views of the Flothe Florentine government were at this time; but it is cer-rentines. min that the Italian states thought them to be dangerous. The generals and troops that the Florentines bought off from Barbiani, to the number of fifteen hundred horse, joined their army, which was in Modena, under Bartolomeo of Prato and Antonio Obigi, and made excursions upon the inhabitants of Reggio and Partha, by which all Barbiani's schemes fell to the ground. Galeazzo complained bitterly of those disorders. The Florentines answered, that Cantelli's men (for Pietro of Pifa had been detained by Barbiani) were not in the service # Florence, they having received only as it were a retaining te, in case their services should be required; a practice they had learned from Galéazzo himself. This apology, however, tems to be very evalive, it being notorious that they were in the Florentine pay; for after re-establishing Nicholas of Fertera in his government, they marched to Tuscany, where they were employed by the Lucquese against the Pisans of Appano's party, whom the Florentines secretly hated. Appiano upon this applied to Barbiani, who marched with his remaining forces to his affistance; upon which the Florentine mercontains retired to Lucca, and the rest of the season was spent nutual skirmishes of no great importance.

MEAN while, the Florentine deputies at Milan sent advice Galeazzo Is a large body of troops, who were marching under the affifts the counts of Alberigo and Malespina, by Galeazzo's order, to the Pilans.

assistance

A. D. 1396.

affistance of the Pisans. The Florentines, affecting great r deration, not knowing where the storm might fall, media a peace, which with some difficulty they at last effected, Tuscany was evacuated of all those mercenaries. Barb marched into Lombardy, where he harraffed the Ferrarefe the Mantuan. The Florentines understanding that in this was instigated by Galeazzo, protected and encouraged the san exiles against Appiano. Thus, matters for some time st neither in a state of peace nor war, till Appiano at last 1 fuaded Galeazzo to enter upon hostilities, and to order his troops and generals to rendezvous at Pifa, which t did in such numbers as struck terror into Florence.

Prepara-Florentines.

NOTWITHSTANDING this the Florentine magistrates tions of the haved with great intrepidity. They now openly took Bar lomew of Prate into their pay, and gave the chief comm of their troops to Bernard, a French nobleman of great n tation, who brought along with him fix hundred choice h and two hundred foot, which were quartered about St. niato and Fucetti: they likewise applied to the Bolognese, their other allies; the' the affistance received from them but flow and infignificant. The first storm of war fell t the Lucquese, who were succoured by Bernard. Appiano hold of this opportunity to attempt to surprize St. Min a strong place, and of the last importance to Florence. this purpose he tampered with Benedetto Marigiadori, or the chief inhabitants of the town, who entered it by twil with no more than feventeen accomplices, and killed the president, expecting, as he had concerted with Appian be supported by a strong detachment from Pisa. tachment happened, by mere accident, to fall in w party of Florentine troops; and, imagining the whole spiracy to be discovered, it returned to Pisa. The to men of St. Miniato, perceiving the conspirators were not ported, took arms and drove them out of the place; the Florentines, who, on the first account they reco thought that their liberties were ruined, took care to against future surprizes. This disappointment served by more to exasperate Galeazzo and his generals, whose t now rendezvoused at Sienna in such numbers, that the

Their dan-rentine army, unable to keep the field, were obliged to ger. shelter in their fortified places.

> IT was generally thought at Florence, that the first o tions of the enemy would be against Arezzo, which is: same distance as Florence is from Sienna; but, contrary 1 pectation, they directed their march against Plorence. their force being ten thousand cavalry, and a proportio number of infantry. As no war had been formally declared, the country people not being upon their guard, were in a most miserable situation, being pursued half naked into Florence, and the neighbouring towns, by the enemy, who proceeded, wherever they came, with fire and sword, so that the whole country about Florence was in a blaze. The Florentines, perceiving their danger, ordered Bernard and their army to draw near their city, whilst, happily for them, their enemies undertook the siege of Segni, a strong town near Florence. Not being able to take it, their generals began to differ amongst themselves, and their army to moulder away; so that the whole expedition returned to Sienna.

A. D.

the

FLORENCE being thus delivered from one of the greatest dangers that had ever threatened her, was in danger of being ruined by the rigorous discipline of her general. Galeazzo was at this time entirely intent upon reducing Mantua, which he belieged by land and water; and diffentions increasing amongst his generals, Paolo Ursini and Biordi, with several other general officers, entered with their troops into the fervice of the Florentines. As most of them were soldiers of fortune, the subjects of Florence sometimes suffered equally from them as from their enemies. Bartholomew of Prato was next in command to Bernard in the Florentine army; but not Bartholobrooking the other's superiority, he plundered some maga-mew of zines which the general had erected for the use of his army; Prato put spon which Bernard put him to death. This punishment to death. inflicted on a general officer, who, in his military capacity, was esteemed to be equal if not superior to Bernard himself, highly disgusted the Florentine auxiliaries and mercenaries. Paolo Ursini and Felippo of Pisa, who was now in the Florentine service, separated from Bernard; and it was with the greatest difficulty that the field-deputies kept the rest of the army together; but they acted with so much prudence and resolution, that their country suffered but little in the end, by the example of justice that had been made.

This was the more wonderful, as the enemy was still very The Flopowerful in Tuscany and Mantua, a state in alliance with Florentines reme. Count Alberigo commanded the Pisan army at Sienna; succour and a great body of the Pisan troops were encamped about Mantua. Policiano and Cortona. Notwithstanding all the difficulties and dangers that then surrounded the Florentines, they resolved to succour Mantua, and for that purpose gave the command of a body of troops to count Hugues de Montsort, who was soon superseded in his command by Carlo Malatesta, a much abler general. All this while the war was carried very briskly on in Tuscany, but generally to the advantage of the Florentines, whose incursions reached to the very gates of Sienna and Pija.

Conspiracy in Flotence;

THE more glorious the conduct of the Florentines was abroad, the greater was their danger at home. Maso de Albizi, ever fince the banishment of Acciaivoli, had held the chief sway in Florence, where he was hated by a great part of the citizens. The chief of the exiles refided at this time at Bologna, and they held a private correspondence with Piggiello and Baronio Cavicciuilia, two citizens who lived admonished and sequestered from the government of Florence. Those two persons invited six young noblemen of great quality, and two citizens of meaner degree, to return fecretly to the city, and to begin an infurrection in favour of the exiled citizens, by affaffinating Albizi. The names of the confpirators were Pachio Cavicciulli, Thomas de Ricci, Antonio de Medici, Benedetto Spini, Antonio Girolami, and Cristoforo Carlone. Those thoughtless young noblemen met with the fate their rashness merited. Being admitted into the city, one of their spies watched Aibizi's house; and upon his coming abroad they ran to kill him, but either casually or advisedly he slipt into an apothecary's shop, and escaped the danger. This disappointment did not daunt the conspirators. Flourishing their swords they called out "Liberty and destruction to "the tyrants," and killed two persons of the opposite party. This proceeding struck the citizens with horror, so that not a man joined the conspirators, who retired to the church of St. Reparata, determined to fell their lives as dear as they could. The church doors, however, were broken open, and the conspirators either killed or seized, and after trial put to death.

discovered and punished.

Another conspiracy.

MACHIAVEL informs us, that when this insurrection was suppressed, Florence escaped another conspiracy, formed by Galeazzo against her liberty. His plot was to introduce a company of resolute banditti into the city, where they were to be admitted by accomplices of their own party, and to murder all the magistrates and ministers of state. One Sammiato was Galeazzo's chief agent in this conspiracy, which he opened to Silvester Cavicciulli, who discovered the whole to the magistrates. Sammiato was taken, and being put to the rack disclosed all the particulars; but only he and another conspirator Davist were put to death. Though it is probable that this conspiracy was more imaginary than real, yet a Balia, or court of enquiry, was immediately erected for punishing all concerned in it, and they proceeded with such rigour that, besides a great number of mechanics, six of the samily of Ricci, six of the Alberti, two of the Medici, three of the Scali, two of the Strozzi, together with Bindi Altoviti, and Bonardo Admiari, were found guilty, and the samilies of Alberti Ricci and Medici, were admonished for ten years. Not contented with this, they condemned Antonio Alberti, tho' one of the most harmless men in Florence, to the payment of a large fine, and to be banished three hundred miles distance from the city; and they afterwards banished all the descendants of the Alberti samily who were above fifteen years of age.

^{*} Machiavel, book iii. Aretin, pag. 233.

During those domestic concustions, the Florentines were The Flomaking a great figure in Lombardy, where their general rentines Carlo Malatefla raised the siege of Mantua, with the entire defeat Gadeteat of Galeazzo's army. His camp was taken, as were leazzo; about two thousand of his cavalry, and about one hundred and twenty small shipping, which had been employed in the Galeazzo upon this sent orders for count Alberigo to leave Tuscany, and to march to his affistance. His departure left the Florentines at liberty to revenge themselves to the full upon the Pisans and the Siennese, for the dreadful calamities they had lately inflicted on their state. Their successes in Tuscany, however, were somewhat abated by the unfavourable turn their affairs took in Lombardy, where their troops had neglected to pursue the great advantage they had obtained over Galeazzo. This remiffiness, together with many of them but loss leaving the service, gave the latter an opportunity of reco-their advering all his shipping, and of shutting up the few Florentines wantages. that remained within their entrenchments. To complete the misfortunes of the Florentines, their general Malatesta was blent at this time, and their allies were extremely backward

in affilting them, because the pope and the Venetians had un-

Though Alberigo had left Lombardy, yet a body of Mila-Revolution Metroops still remained at Pisa. Their behaviour was so at Pisa. Mupportable to the inhabitants, that a formal battle ensued, in which most of the soldiers were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners, and they who escaped were forced to fly out of the city. Amongst the wounded was Paolo Savelli their general; and amongst the prisoners were several officers of great rank. The townsmen made themselves masters of all the arms, horses, and baggage that had belonged to the sold ers, who, as they gave out, intended to seize upon and plunder their city. This event gave vast pleasure to the Florentines, who immediately sent a deputation with offers of assistance and support to the Pisans, whom they congratulated upon their recovered liberty. The deputies were received with great civility; but the address dress of Galeazzo frustrated their scheme. He laid the blame of what had happened entirely upon the rapaciousness and imprudence of his own soldiers, and highly commended the Pisans for what they had done. By this means, and by the management of Appiano, still the implacable enemy of the Florentines, the war between the two states was renewed; and the Florentines plundering all the tract of coast between Pisa and Leghorn, returned to Florence loaded with plunder.

A negotiation for peace. THE negotiation for peace still went on at Imola; but Galeazzo, having now recovered his affairs, insisted upon such unreasonable terms as gave umbrage to the Venetians, who had for some time been jealous of his power. He was still carrying on the siege of Mantua; but the Venetians now sent a formal ambassy, requiring him to raise it, or to expect them for his enemies. This denunciation so greatly alarmed Galeazzo, that he began to treat of peace in good earnest, and the conferences were removed to Pavia. This negotiation did not, however, slacken the preparations of the Fiorentines for war; for while the negotiations were depending, they sent deputies to hire troops both in France and Germany.

A. D. 1398.

ABOUT the beginning of the year 1398, Biordi, a foldier; of fortune, who had by turns ferved Galeazzo and the Florentines, was killed by a private inhabitant of Perugia, where he had for some time domineered. The townsmen, however, did not approve of the manner of his death, which Biordi's friends and followers revenged upon the murderer's , family, he himself escaping. The Florentines offered the Perugians a body of troops for their protection, which was xcepted of; but foon after the family of the Ubertini, and feveral noblemen of great interest in Tuscany, declared for Galeazzo, and put themselves and their possessions under his protection. This defection alarmed the Florentines the more as he had found means to surprise Civitella, a strong castle in the neighbourhood of Arezzo. All those events seemed we indicate a continuance of the war; but the Florentines, being now joined by the Venetians, were encouraged to hope for affistance from several powerful princes, both in France and Italy. In the mean while they regained possession of Given tella; and it was agreed between them and Galeazzo, the as it was next to impossible for them to settle the term of a definitive peace, that they should conclude a truce full ten years. This measure being determined upon, the rentines countermanded the troops that were preparing march to their affiftance; but that was far from reftoring! tranquility of Tuscany. Galeazzo, and the enemies of b Florentines, soon perceived that all the view of the Venetia was to keep the war out of Lombardy, and that the Florentines were to expect no affistance from them in Tuscany. The troops, therefore, who had been dismissed by Galeazzo, by his connivance broke into Tuscany, and took quarters in the Siennese, while the Ubertini, and the other noblemen in the Cafantin, finding that they were furrounded by the Florentine fortreffes and territories, took arms to open themselves a free egress and regress to and from their estates, which were re-. fused them by the Florentines.

A truce concluded.

By this time Appiano of Pisa, and his eldest son Vannes, Revolution being dead, his fecond fon Gerardo succeeded to his power. at Pila. Pretending to be well affected towards the Florentines, and jealous of Galeazzo, he fent Graffolini, one of his friends, privately to Florence, to confer with some of the chief men there about entering into a league with them. The terms he demanded was, that the Florentines should, at their own expence, furnish him with and pay fix hundred horse and two hundred foot; but the Florentines, thinking the demand mercenary and dishonourable, rejected it, tho' they offered to become the hearty allies of the Pisans upon an equal honourable footing.

In the year 1300 the war again raged in Tuscany, and Gahazzo's party in Pifa coming to the knowledge of the late negotiation with the Florentines, prevailed with Gerrado, who State of was unequal to the post he held, partly by force and partly by persuasions, to resign to him the government of Pisa. The Florentines confidered this acquisition as a threatning blow to the independency of their state, and the rather, as he made no secret that he would likewise soon render himself master both of Sienna and Perugia. As to the Siennese, they had been long his allies, but never his subjects; and they still retained an appearance of independency. The Perugians were in a worse situation. The pope claimed the sovereignty of their tate, as having been formerly annexed to the see of Rome, and gave his general orders to reduce it. The Perugians upon this applied for protection to the Florentines, who, unwilling to embroil themselves with his holiness, declined being concerned in the affair. The Perugians, who mortally hated all subjection to the pope, were then forced to apply for protection to Galeazzo, which he readily granted them, before the Florentines, by the persuasion of some of their best patriots, could repair the false step they had made when they rejected the offers of the Perugians. The consequence of those great acquisitions made by Galeazzo, was, that the Bolagnese renounced their league with Florence, and entered into his alliance, and the Sienrese submitted to him. Thus he became more powerful than ever in Tuscany, without giving the Florentines any handle for SECT. complaining that he had violated the truce.

S E C T. VIII.

Containing the Distresses of the Florentines. Their Country ravaged by a Plague. A Conspiracy disco vered. Revolutions in the Empire. The Floren tines invite the Emperor into Italy. His Arriva there. He disagrees with the Florentines, and re turns to Germany. The Duke of Milan complain of the Florentines. War in the Bolognese. Deat. of Galeazzo. The Adventures of Aretin the Histo rian. Conquest of Pisa by the Florentines. Revo lutions in the Popedom. The Council of Constance is held. An Account of Braccio the Perugian. Was between the Florentines and the Milanese. Peace concluded. The Emperor Sigifmund arrives in Italy: returns, and dies. Distresses of the Florentines. A general Council held at Ferrara. The Duke of Savoy chosen Pope Tuscany invaded by Nicholas of Picino, who is conquered in the Year 1440.

Danger of THE year 1400 opened with a very gloomy prospect to the Flothe Florentines, through the growing power of Galeazzo rentines. on the one hand, and that of the Ubertini and the Casantia lords on the other. To add to their diffresses, Uguccio, who was then the leading man or lord of Cortona, seemed disposer to favour Galeazzo, by prohibiting provisions or goods a any kind to be carried through his dominions to Florence, un less the Florentines would grant him most unreasonable terms To oblige them to comply, he prevailed with some of the Arezzians to surprise Montagnana, a strong place, extremel convenient for either party, when at war with the other. The act of hostility brought on others from the Florentines. The fent one of their generals, with a party of horse, to open the passages of the lakes and rivers that Uguccio had damme up, which was done without any opposition from him. I. the mean while, Galeazzo fent four hundred horse into Cafantin, to act as an opportunity should present, and foster a war between the Bolognese and Astorgi of Faenza.

A terrible pestikace.

DURING those commotions, so terrible a pestilence brown out at Florence, that it threatened to depopulate the city. I swept off equally the old and young of both sexes; nor with there any avoiding it, but by slight. All the principal inhabitant biants retired to the Bolognese; and of those whose circumflances did not permit them to fly, no sewer than thirty thousand died in a sew weeks. This pestilence ceasing in other places of Italy, as well as Florence, the war raged with more violence than ever. Paclo Guinist seized the government of Lucca. Uguccio lord of Cortona, and Robert count of Pupio, one of the Casantin lords, died. Both of them had been enemies to Forence; but the latter, upon his death-bed, had made the Florentines the guardians of his insant son, who was accordingly bred up at Florence. Francisco de Casali had sucteeded his kinsman Uguccio in the government of Cortona, and seemed better inclined towards the Florentines than his predecessor had been. Guinist, the new lord of Lucca, affected a neutrality; but being tampered with by Galeazzo, he civilly declined entering into a league with the Florentines.

The late pestilence had given the disaffected Florentines an A play diffeopportunity of caballing against the government; and a party covered, of them, who had fied to the Bolognesse, had entered into a and paconspiracy for murdering the magistrates, and placing them-nished. selves in their seats; and, in short, for altering the whole system of the civil government. The conspiracy was discovered by Silvestro Adimari, who had been solicited to enter into it by Ricci, one of the saction, and who disclosing the whole to the government, they seized and put to death the ringleaders of the conspiracy, and sentenced to banishment many of their consederates, who had not yet returned to Florence.

Towards the end of the year, Giovanni Bentivoglio seized Revolution upon the government of Bologna. This was an event of so at Bologn great importance to the Florentines, that they sent an extraor nadinary deputation composed of the ablest and greatest men of their state, to congratulate him upon his accession to that government, and to offer him the friendship and assistance of Plorence. Galeazzo was not behind them in the same prosessions; and his deputies seemed to vie with those of Florence in courting Bentivoglio's friendship; but he leaned towards the sormer. The affairs of Italy were now about to assume a new face.

The emperor Charles IV. was succeeded in the empire German by his son Wenceslaus, whose wicked disposition was heightened assures. by an infanity of mind, contracted through intemperance; and, after various revolutions of fortune, he was deposed from the empire, the electors having chosen Robert count-palatine of the Rhine, and duke of Bavaria, to succeed him. Amongst the other marks of misgovernment Wenceslaus was charged with, one was, that he had, to the prejudice of the impaimperial dignity, fold the rights of the empire over L to Galeazzo for one hundred and fifty thousand cre gold, and given him the title of duke of Milan. fition of Wenceslaus gave the Florentines hopes of a from the new emperor, who fent ambassadors to Rome nify his election to Benedict, one of the popes; for the two then in Europe. The Florentines hearing his amb were on the road, treated them with extraordinary c and fent deputies of their own into Germany to invite 1 peror into Italy. He heard them with great compli but, like his predecessors, all his answers implied that pected they were to give him money.

A. D. 1401.

tivoglio,

The Florentines

Soon after Bentivoglio continued the war that he entered into between Astorgi of Faenza and the Bologn. assist Ben- both Galeazzo and the Florentines sent him auxiliari Aftergi being well supported, a peace was concluded t him and Bentivoglio, to the great diffike of count & who commanded a separate body of twelve hundred and was Aftorgi's bitter enemy. His refentment went that he brought Galeazzo to take part against Ben. whose chief dependence now was upon the Florent theirs was upon the emperor. They, therefore, bein day apprehensive that all Tuscany, if not all Italy, wo under the power of Galeazzo, pressed him, more than come to their relief, and a bargain between them was struck.. The Florentines obliged themselves to pay and invite emperor two hundred thousand golden ducats, part in the emperor and part as foon as he entered Galeazzo's dominions in into Italy. tile manner. The payment of this vast sum was to be made at Venice by the hands of Bicci, a Florentin chant of great credit and reputation. The emperor, might touch the money, filled all Italy with the new preparations; but, after the first payment, they were what flackened. He arrived, however, at Trent; and der to be intitled to the relidue of the money, he ac against Brescia, a town belonging to Galeazzo. latter opposed him with a strong body of Italian cavali though the emperor's army, having been joined by duke of Austria, and other German princes, was ve merous, yet it was intirely defeated by Galeazzo's go and obliged to retire to Trent with vast loss. to return to Germany, without doing fomething wor great name and preparations, he was perfuaded by the tine deputies, and Francisco of Carrara, to march to where a new deputation, confishing of the four greate in Florence, attended him with fix hundred Italian horse by the famous Sforza. Those deputies, in conferring in, found that he had nothing really in view but to remainder of the money, and that he was so miserably e could not keep his army together, without depending Florentines.

s inability of the emperor was a tender point for the He deceives ines; and therefore Albizi and Vittori, who were at the them; the deputation, returned to Florence, where they gave I account of their negociation. The Florentines, unthat the emperor's indigence should be publicly known, eth instructions to their deputies, who remained with Padua, promiting to gratify all his demands, provided ld continue with his army in Italy all the winter, and pon hostilities against Galeazzo early in the spring. infilted not only upon the relidue of the money being ately paid, but that they should enter upon a new subtreaty with him, if he remained in Italy. The Flo-, forefeeing his drift, refused to comply with his terms; ter spending a month in mutual altercations, he oris army to retreat towards Germany; while he himself Venice, where he complained most bitterly of the ini of the Florentines, and their breach of good faith. orentines, who greatly depended on the Venetians, took fend two deputies to undeceive them. In a public e they obtained, they complained, though with great , in their turn, that the emperor had not fulfilled his nents. They infilted, that he had received more than money that had been promised him; and that the ler was to be paid only after he had begun hostilities Galeazzo with a powerful army; that his army was and that he had retreated from their enemy upon the pearance of danger. The Venetians seemed to take th the Florentines; but strenuously endeavoured to p matters between them. All their mediation was , and the emperor left their city.

evailed with them to have continued this negotiation, to Padua. vent was, that the emperor, upon his receiving the he demanded, countermanded the march of his troops, urned to Padua, where he passed the winter.

of spirit in Italy. Neither the pope nor the Venetians rit of the be brought to declare against Galeazzo; and the em-Floren-pretending he could not work impossibilities, returned times; rmany. All this time Galeazzo's ambassadors, and the time deputies, were pleading the cause of their principals 20. Hist, Vol. XXXVI.

at Venice; but the Venetians, though they appeared o casions to side with the Florentines, could not be prevai to depart from their neutrality. The emperor's ex into Italy, however, at the invitation of the Florenti of service to them, as it encouraged several states particularly, to oppose Galeazzo.

IT was no fooner known that the emperor and were on their return to Germany, than Galeazzo decla war against Bentivoglio of Bologna, with whom he ha to kept some measures. He was now reconciled to the of Mantua, whom he fent into the Bolognese at the t powerful army, commanded, under him, by some of general-officers in Italy. The Florentines, as usu raithful to their allies; and fent their general Bernar they still retained in their service, to the assistance of Some other states, the allies of Florence, their example, till the Bolognese auxiliaries grew so I that the Florentines seemed to rest the fate of Tuscar Italy upon that of Bologna. The Florentines, and the took post at the village of Casaleci, about four miles ure totally logna, as being the most proper for covering that the attempts of the enemy. But there was no co as to the goodness and discipline of the troops. Th tines and their allies were attacked with fuch fury by t mies, that they were intirely defeated, and all of th cept a very few who escaped to Bologna, were cut i Bernard and some of the chief Florentine generals w prisoners. The consequence of this great defeat v the enemies of Bentivoglio within Bologna took are after killing him, opened their gates to Galcazzo's par now made themselves masters of Bologna. THE Florentines were struck with the greatest co

but they

defcated.

many leaders of different interests, that, far from their blow, they gave the Florentines leifure to pre their own fafety. The first thing they did was to attempts of the Ubaldini and the Calantine lords, who l arms after they heard the Florentines had been defeater next refumed their old system of politics, in app affiftance to the pope and the Venetians, who, the were very unexty at the vast growth of Galeazzo's por though the friendship of both was sought with extra nettness by the Florentimes, both of them seemed to horrors of a war. The pope's strength lay chiefly it ritual arms, and he had feen both Bologna and tion at the news of the defeat of an army, on which their dependence. But their enemies were command

They recover from their con-· sternation. wrested from the papacy. The Venetians, pretending they had suffered greatly by their late wars with Genoa, and the checks their trade had received, declined entering into any engagements with the Florentines against Galeazzo, unless the latter were at almost all the expence of the war. The Florentines thought it ignominious to submit to such conditions, and, dreading the infidelity of so mercenary a people, rejected the terms.

WHILE the Florentines were in this state of disappointment Galeazzo and anxiety, Galeazzo fent amballadors to Venice with the propoles a proposals for peace, in which the Florentines were to be in-peace; cluded. This news was at first discredited at Fiorence, and Galeazzo's intention distrusted. At last the Florentines ordered their deputies at Venice to enter upon a negociation with Galeazze and the Venetians at the fame time. But a great event now happened, which rid them of their anxieties. This was the death of Galeazzo, who furvived the taking of Belogna but a few weeks. According to Arctin , he was fincere in his proposals for an accommodation with Florence, that he might leave his sons, who were very young, in peaceable pollettion of his great and opulent dominions. Bilius b, a Milanese contemporary historian, is filent as to his fincerity: and, to the glory of Florence, he tells us, that they were the only people in Italy whom Galeazzo had not made either his subjects or his friends; and that, had he lived but a few days longer, Florence, now deserted by all her allies, must have been conquered, as fixteen thousand horse, and an equal numiber of foot, were on their march against it as far as Sienna, when they received orders to halt. The Florentines found means to come at the certainty of Galeazzo's death, though His death, It was kept very private; and they dispatched orders to their deputies at Venice to proceed no farther in the negociations, other with the Venetians or the Milanefe.

But the safety of Florence must have still been precarious, and the dishad it not been for the difference must have prevailed amongst the order of his generals and grandees of Milan. Galeazzo had left to his eldest court. ion, John, the greatest part of his dominions; and to his second son Philip. Pavia, Novarra, Vercelli, Alessandria, and other places in the neighbourhood; and had made his natural son, Gabriel, lord of Pisa, Luna, Seranza, and other places on that coast. He left the tutelage of his sons to Peter arch-bishop of Milan, Carlo Malatesta lord of Rimini, and Giacomo Vermi. It appears by Biliui, that the court of Milan, notwithstanding its power, was at this time little better than barbarous, which must have been occasioned by their long wars; and that the education of the young princes was neglected, merely for want of persons capable to instruct them. The relations of Galeazzo, who were numerous and ambitious, took amiss that they had been excluded from all share in the government; and no regard was paid to Galeazza's widow, the mother of the princes, who were at last put under the tutelage of Giovanni Cassati, a soldier, but a man of virtue: but this Cassati was soon murdered by the sactious nobility, and the Florentines are accused d of having somented rebellions amongst the Milanese subjects.

¹ Ibid. pag. 248.

b Dillius apud Murat. tom.

The Florentines

the pope.

This charge, however, redounds to their honour, as they looked upon the Tuscan acquisitions of Galeazzo to have been make war made by treachery as much as force; and, in effect, all they in Milan. did was to invite the neighbouring states, who had been thereby difmembered from their alliance, to recover their liberty. Being well acquainted with the diffentions that prevailed at Milan, they at last entered into a league with pope Boniface, and took the field against the Milanese, naming Nicholas of Ferrara for their general. Their first attempt was on the Parmesan, where they were stoutly opposed by Otto, the Milanese governor. At last a negociation was proposed; and it was managed between Malatesta, on the part of the Milanese, and Gianelli, brother to the pope, on that of the allies. The Florentines had demanded the rendition of Bologna and Perugia. Malatesta acted so artfully, that he persuaded Gianelli Their great that it could be by no means for the interest of his holiness to fervice to depend upon such powerful allies as the Florentines; and that the court of Milan was ready to restore Bologna and Perugia to the Holy See, provided the Florentines were left out of the negociation. This proposal was agreed to, and Gianelli was immediately put in possession of Perugia. Upon this, the allied army returned to Tuscany.

WHATEVER refentments the Florentines might have, upon being excluded from the late negociation, they were so far from making any public complaints, that they made a merit of being the means of re-annexing to the Holy See two fuch valuable acquifitions, and of having dismembered them from the Milanese. They next attempted to rouse the Siennese to a sense of their liberty, by encouraging and supporting the party there that was in opposition to the Milanese. But failing in this attempt, they declared war against the Siennese. who threw themselves upon the protection of the Holy Set

d Billius, ubi sup.a, p. 13.

relli. This being more agreeable to the Florentines they had continued their attachments with the court n, and a peace succeeded between Florence and

IS LAUS, son of Charles of Durazzo, was at this Ladislaus, g of Naples, and pope Boniface was dead. Ladislaus, king of man of parts and ambition, foon grew as formidable Naples, lorentines as Galeazzo had ever been. Pope Innocent formidable d Boniface in the Holy See; and Ladiflaus, under pre- to the Flocongratulating him upon his accession, repaired to rentines. out his real intention was to form a party against the hich might oblige him to retire in disgust from Rome, him (Ladiflaus) an opportunity of making himself f that city. The pope, who was old and indolent, y and experienced, faw that a powerful faction had med against him amongst the Romans, and demanded : from the Florentines, who fent him a body of horse. ie hiltorian was then at the papal court, and a great : with his holiness; but he gives us a very indifferent the humanity of that court, when he tells us, that oble Romans, who had been sent upon a peaceable on to the pope, were, upon their return, made priand butchered in cold blood, by command of the ephew; and that he himself very narrowly missed irdered on that account. His holiness, however, was erved by his Florentine auxiliaries, that he escaped to where he remained for some months, till the Romans, own accord, invited him back to their city. ow come to what we may almost call the final period History of forentine glory. Their recovery, in a few years, from the war of the deepest despondency, to a condition of pre- with Pisa.

Leedrifio Cribelli, who Life of this extraorrince, is highly difith our historian Aretin, says, was in the greatn and honour in Floomitting all mention forza, who, as he tells bred up under Sir John Hawkwood. The reason perhaps was, because Sforza was held to be of a very mean original, no better than the son of a farmer; his true name being Attendula, but got the name of Sforza from his boldness, or impetuosity.

aws to those from whom they apprehended the greatir, can properly be ascribed only to their own mag-, and their wonderful attachment to independency. ir loss of the battle in the Bolognese, their infantry rallied by Sforza (A), a soldier of fortune, but of great and genius in war, who brought them safe to Florence. A. D.

1405.

This service, though the Florentine historians have been ungrateful enough to suppress the mention of it, enabled them to recover their affairs to the surprising degree we have seen, and even to meditate the conquest of Pisa, to which they were encouraged by the diffentions and factions that still. prevailed in the Milanese (B). There was a kind of a radical enmity between the Pisans and the Florentines. The former had, of old, given laws upon the Tuscan sea, and had been masters of Sardinia, Corsica, and the Balearic islands. antiquity of their city, compared to which they thought Florence but an upstart, increased their contempt of the Florentines; while the Florentines, equally proud, but conscious of the vast superiority which commerce gave them over the Pisans, considered them with disdain. This diversity of fentiments begat the same in interests, the Florentines following those of the Guelphs, and the Pisans those of the Gibelins, But the death of Galeazzo deprived Pisa at once of her master and protector, and left her exposed to the resentment of the Florentines, Gabriel, Galeazzo's natural son, being but young and difregarded. According to Palmerius, the scheme of the Florentine conquest of Pisa was suggested to them by the Genoese, and the anti-pope Benedict, who then resided in that city, with a view of bringing the Florentines into Benedici's interest, and to divert them from joining with the Venetians. The matter at first was proposed by way of negociation, and that the Florentines should pay a considerable sum of money; by the hands of the pope and the Genoese, to Gabriel, on condition of his yielding up all his property in Pifa. This propofal was communicated by Bonedict to the Genoele, and by Bouccicault, the French governor of Genoa, to a Florentine merchant, named Alderotti, then residing at Genoa, who trans-The magistrates of Florence thought mitted it to Florence. the affair to be of so much importance, that they sent a trusty officer, one Caponi, to confer with Alderotti; but, above all, to scrutinize into the right which Bouccicault and the antipope had to dispose of Pisa. Caponi accordingly addressed himself to Bouccicault, and desired to know whether he was impowered to fell Pisa to the Florentines. The Frenchman told him he was not, but that he would foon be impowered;

* PALMERIUS, ubi supra, p. 169.

the conquest of Pisa by the Flo- tract called De Captivitate Pisarentines is extracted from Palmerius, a Florentine historian,

(B) The following account of who wrote at that time a little rum, published by Murateria tom. xix.

because pope Benediet proposed to reside at Pisa, in which case the Pisans would certainly offer him the command of their citadel, which he would deliver up to the Florentines. Caponi then demanded how much money was to be paid by the Florentines. He was answered four hundred thousand ducats of gold; half of which was to go as a subsidy to Carrara prince of Padua, and the other half by way of indemnification to Gabriel lord of Pisa.

So quick-fighted a people as the Florentines were not to be Shameful imposed upon by so infamous, yet so fallacious a proposal juggling of They ordered their agent to inform Bouccicault, that the mo-theFrench. ney should be forth coming, upon the surrender of Pisa to the Florentines. In the mean while, Gabriel, hearing of the anti-pope and Bouccicault's treachery, and conscious of his own deferted condition, applied for advice and affistance to Albizi at this time continued to have the the Florentines. chief direction at Florence, and, sensible of Gabriel's motives, he obtained leave of the magistracy to have a secret interview with him f. The particulars of this interview, as described by Palmerius, are more curious than instructive. But though it was very artfully managed, the Pisans came to the knowledge of it, and it was immediately given out that Gabriel was about to fell Pisa to the Florentines. The Pisans took arms. The Flo-Gabriel was obliged to fly to the citadel; and, despairing of all rentines affiliance from the Florentines, he applied to Bouccicault, who huy Pifa; fent a body of troops to his aid. Upon this the Florentines fent two deputies, one to Gabriel, the other to Bouccicault, to treat of the surrender of Pisa and its territory. Petrasanta was pitched upon for the place of treaty; and, after various altercations, it was agreed, that the Florentines should pay to Gabriel a certain fum (C) for the town, territory, and castle of Pi/a. Part of it was paid upon the furrender of the citadel by Gabriel, and part was to be discharged by monthly payments, upon the bargain being performed on Gabriel's part.

f PALMERIUS, ubi supra, p. 171.

(C) The reader of modern history is often baulked of a great deal of information by the inaccurate manner in which writers mention sums of money. In the present case, for instance, our author says, Florentini centum & quinquaginta supra duo milia librarum auri pretii nomine tesolverent. The literal meaning of which is, two thousand one hundred and fifty pounds; a very inconsiderable sum, when estimated by any species of money then known; but if we suppose the pound weight, it seems to be too large a price for the Florentines, rich as they were, to pay.

The citadel of Pila was put into the hands of Lorenzo Ruffe. fani, one of the Florentine gonfaloniers; and the first payment was made by Caponi. The Pisans, however, did not think that Gabriel had a right to fell their liberties and country. They therefore took arms, and befreged the citadel, that had been furrendered to the Florentines, and which was garrifoned and lose it only by a company of raw country militia, who held it out for fome time; but were at last obliged to surrender it the very day on which it was given up. War declared Pilans.

again.

THE news of this loss created great discontent at Florence, where some were so generous as to approve of the spirit and against the courage of the Pisans; but the majority called out for an immediate war, against which the graver citizens strongly remonstrated. While this matter was under deliberation, five of the principal citizens of Pifa came as deputies to Florence, and demanded a public audience, which was granted them. The purpose of the deputation was far different from what the Florentines expected. The deputies boldly justified what had been done by their countrymen, and demanded back fuch of their castles as, by the bargain made with Gabriel, had been delivered up to the Florentines, and were still in their hands. This spirited behaviour, however equitable it might have been, reconciled all parties amongst the Florentines; so that it was unanimously resolved to lose no time in declaring war against Pisa. Ten field-deputies were accordingly created, and an army was raifed, the command of which was given to Bertol. do Ursini. Bertoldo accordingly marched into the Pisan territory, and laid siege to Vice, a town which served as a key. to Pisa itself. Winter however coming on, very little progress was made in the siege, and the Florentines were obliged to wreak their indignation against Ruffosani, and the militis who had garrisoned the citadel of Pisa, by condemning them, to death.

9 be sege of Pifa un- fion. dertaken.

THE Pilans were not wanting to themselves on this occa-All civil diffensions amongst them were abolished. Families at variance were obliged to intermarry with each other, that they might unite in the common defence of their country; and religious processions were every day held to implore the assistance of heaven. All other human means for their defence were provided, and a confiderable army was raised. The Florentine army was better disciplined and officered, and they at first deseated the Pisans in every encounter. ter, however, raised fresh troops, and marched along the seacoast to attack the Florentines, who were still intent upon the fiege of Vico. Sforza, who continued to serve as a general officer with great reputation in the Florentine army, was detached tached to meet them, and partly by courage, partly by ffratagem, its deseated them; but their general Paccio, with the greatest part of their army, escaped to Pisa, where every thing was now in confusion. After the expulsion of Gabriel and the Florentines, no form of government had been settled, and every one aspired to be master of the city. Gambacurta, a relation of him we have already mentioned, prevailed; and was chosen regent, or, as he is called, the rector, of the people. He was no fooner established in his power, than he employed it to the most wicked purposes, by secretly putting to death all the principal persons of the state, whom he suspected not to be in his interest; and this barbarity created so universal a detellation of him, that he was foon deprived of his power.

In the mean while the Pisans, being threatened with a Famine in famine, fent some ships to purchase corn in Sicily Upon this Pifa, the Florentines fitted out a squadron to intercept them in their which is return, and took a large vessel loaded with corn under the blocked up fortifications of Vada, a town situated at the mouth of the by the Floriver Czcina. Bertolda was all this while vigorously pressing the fiege of Vice; and it was on that occasion that guns were first made use of by the Florentines. Palmerius gives a most frightful description of several other dreadful machines employed in the same siege, insomuch that he says there was not a house in the whole city that was not beaten down or damaged. We cannot, however, suppose that the machines or artillery he made use of, were so tremendous as they are described to be; for the place, though not remarkable for its frength, held out for above eight months. This tired out the patience of the Florentines, and Bertoldo was superseded in his command, which was given to Olizi; and thus a whole year was spent by the Florentines, at a great expence, but to very little purpose. The spirit of both people seemed to grow with the difficulties they had to encounter. The befreged held out with amazing resolution against all the power of Florence; and the Florentines, reflecting upon the vast expense which the acquisition of so inconsiderable a place had cost them, changed their field-deputies, and resolved at all hazards to beliege Pifa itself. Foreseeing that the other powers of Italy might throw obstacles in their way, they entered into negociations with the two chief of them, Ladiflaus king of Naples, and Otto, or Otho, duke of Parma. They agreed with the former to stand neutral in the quarrel between him and the pope, provided he did not affift the Pisans; and they purchased the neutrality of the other by a fum of money. The spring of the year 1406 was now approaching, and Vice Gill held The Florentines, to make the campaign decisive, ordered Obizi to continue that siege, and committed the command of the expedition against Pisa to Luca Fiascani, a Genoese; but joined in commission with him Maso Albizi and Gino Caponi.

Pisa more closely besieged.

DETERMINED to make their chief efforts against Pifa, they turned the fiege of Vico into a blockade, and drew off all the men they could from Obizi's army; so that the whole of their troops, exclusive of irregulars, artizans, and workmen, amounted to five thousand horse and seven thousand foot, the place of rendezvous being Cascia. But, after a day's march from thence towards Pifa, it was found that no magazines had been erected for their support, though the contractors, who refided at Genoa, had affured them that plenty of all necessaries had been provided. The few fruits which the earth then furnished were soon consumed, and it was proposed in a general council of war to return to Florence. This, upon debate, was found to be equally difgraceful and dangerous; and it was refolved to struggle a few days longer with famine, rather than forego their mighty expectations. In the mean while, purveyors were dispatched to Florence, and through all Tuscany, particularly along the sea-coasts, to purchase bread; and proclamations were issued, that all provisions imported into the Florentine camp should be duty-free. By these precautions, plenty foon succeeded famine in the Florentine army.

Operations

THE Florentines then made dispositions for cutting off all of the fiege. communication by water with Pifa, and threw a bridge over the Arno, by which means they intercepted feveral ships laden with provisions for Pifa; so that Paccio, the Pifan general, left the city, with all his horse, for fear of being starved. The Pisans attempted to restore their communication by water, and their fleet attacked that of the Florentines; but with so little fuccess, that the inhabitants were thrown into the utmost despondency, and nothing but their inveterate hatred of the Florentines could have prevented an immediate furrender of their city. In the beginning of June, the Arno swelling to a great height, the Pilans, by chaining together large rafts of wood, which they drove upon the Florentine bridge, broke it down. Upon this, imagining the Florentine army to be divided, they resolved to attack that part of it next Pisa, which they thought to be the weakest. The Florentines had raised works at both the abutments of the bridge that had been destroyed; and Cola Matteo, who commanded the Pisans after the departure of Paccio, made the necessary dispositions for the attack. The

The Florentines, whose main body lay on the opposite strand, were in great perplexity how to save their garrison, when Sforza offered to be answerable for it at the peril of his life, if the command of the work was given to him. This proposal was agreed to, and he immediately threw himself into a little skiff, and, with one companion and a horse, with extreme difficulty and danger, he reached the other shore, and entered the fort. Tartalia, like Sforza, a soldier of fortune, jealous of Sforza's reputation, threw himself into another skiff, and arrived at the fort about the same time.

To a modern military officer those two exploits may ap-Sforza repear very inconsiderable; but they were at that time thought warded. to be so daring, that the Pisans lost all courage, and, without striking a blow, returned to their city, satigued and wearied, after a fruitless march. Many of them were so tired, that they remained in the fields and woods; and the river decreasing next day, all the Florentine army passed it, and made them prisoners. This exploit, performed by Sforza, was looked upon by the Florentines to be so important h, that they settled a pension upon him of sive hundred ducats a year for life, and made it payable to him, whatever service he should embrace.

THE Florentine army lay now before the walls of Pifa; The Floand, from the desponding behaviour of the besieged, they were rentines made to believe that they might master that city by an esca-miscarry in lade (D) in the night. For this purpose a picked detachment an escawas draughted. Their armour was light, and, to make the lade. less noise, their feet were bare, and they mounted the walls, Notwithstanding all their precautions, when they thought themselves sure of success, the besieged took the alarm. Men, women, and children ran to the fortifications, which they defended to bravely, that the Florentines were beaten off. The Pifans were so much elated by this short gleam of success, that they dragged at the tail of an ass the mangled body of a Florentine soldier through their streets; an indignity which was refented by the corps to which the foldier belonged, by cutting in pieces all the Pifan prisoners who were in their cuftody.

The miscarriage of the escalade revived animosities amongst Divisions the Florentine officers. Sforza and Tartalia continued still to in their becompetitors for command. Both of them were unexcep-camp.

eldenoit

CRIBELLIUS de Vita Sfortiæ vicecomitis, apud MURAT.

⁽D) Thir, in the modern military language, is called a Coup te main.

tionable, as to their fidelity, as well as abilities; but Tartalia complained that Sforza intended to poison him. Albizi and Caponi, who then attended the Florentine army in their tour of duty, as field-deputies, did all they could to make up this difference, which threatened an universal mutiny in the army. Tartalia, however, under the shew of great refignation, still harboured refentment; and as foon as the service of the two field-deputies was expired, their differences broke out with more rancour than before. While those factious disputes continued to divide the Florentine army, it was attacked by pestilential diseases, arising from the unwholsomeness of the foil and neighbourhood in which they were encamped. magistracy of Florence were of opinion, that the inactivity of their troops contributed greatly to their distress, and orders were given for pressing the siege with more activity than ever, Accordingly the bridge across the Arno was repaired. lia commanded the troops on one side of the river, and Sforza those on the other. A junction was effected between the main army and the troops that still lay before Vice, in fuch a manner that both places were thoroughly invested, and bridges of boats were thrown over several parts of the Arno.

Cruelty of both par-

THOSE dispositions struck terror into the Fisans; and Gam: bacurta, who continued to command in the city, turned out. of it all the useless mouths, the better to husband his provi-The Florentines, aware of his defign, proclaimed in their camp, that no quarter should be given to any who were thus turned out, and they actually hanged up great numbers in fight of their fellow citizens; while they committed others, in rotten boats, to the stream of the Arno, which carried them back to Pisa, with copies of the fatal proclamation round their necks. The Florentines, however, relented in this inhuman practice, and were contented with branding such of the male Pisans who fell into their hands, and cutting the skirts from the cloaths of the females, and then turning both back into the city. The consequence was, that the city was foon reduced to the last degree of misery by famine; nor was Vice in a better condition. While this inhuman war was thus raging, the people of Biento, a town in the neighbourhood, acted the part of mediators, and applied to the inhabitants and garrison of Vico to persuade them to surrender, in which they succeeded; and Albizi was sent from Florence to settle the capitulation. The terms were, that if Vico was not fuccoured in ten days, it should surrender to Albizi, which it accordingly did.

The Pisans

THE Pifans by this time were reduced through famine to despair; and Vico being taken, they lost their chief dependence, and thought at last of treating. One Gasparo, a citizen of Pifa, was fent out to confer, for that purpole, with Caponi and the other field-deputies; and, after a negotiation of leveral days, every thing was confidered to be as good as concluded upon; when all of a fudden, in the night time, Pifa resounded with acclamations of joy and musical instruments, and blazed with illuminations and bonfires, and at day-break the duke of Burgundy's colours were feen flying on the walls. Soon after a French officer came into the Florentine camp, and informed them that Pifa now belonged to his mafter the duke of Burgundy, who had ordered him to require the Florentines to delift from the fiege. Though the Florentines were not a little startled at this message, yet they resolutely answered, that they had too great an opinion of the honour and good faith of the duke, for them to believe that any such message had come from him; and that they were refolved to profecute the fiege with more vigour than ever. This resolute answer served only to render the French officer the more insolent; and he made it his business to swagger round the camp the whole day, denouncing vengeance against the Florentines if they did not raise the siege; till at last he became so intolerable, that some of their officers threw him into the Arno. He escaped by swimming ashore, and went to Florence, where he repeated all his extravagancies; but was foon driven out of that city.

and

IT quickly appeared, that the Pisans had actually made a but transfurrender of themselves and their city to the duke of Bur-fer their gundy, brother of the French king, who was in no condition fovereignty to relieve them, but by means of Bouccicault, who still con- to the duke tinued to be his governor in Genoa. The Florentines, though of Burthey diffembled, knew of the transaction; but did not chuse gundy. to break with the French. Their fuccess against Pisa had been chiefly owing to three large gallies k lent them by the Genocle, which blocked up the mouth of the Arno; and they likewise had in their army many Genocle soldiers and engineers. upon whom they had great dependence. Fearing, however, that Bouccicault might prevail with the Genoese magistrates to recal their troops and failors, the Florentines obliged all the Genoese in their service to take an oath, that they would in no event, and at no command, leave the service of the Fhrentines within a certain stated time. Perhaps the largeness of the Florentine pay was the best guaranty of this oath; for when Bouccicault, foon after, by his mafter's orders, required dering them. Gino Caponi, to remove those suspicions, called a general affembly both of the magistrates and people, and made a formal speech to assure them of the good faith and friendship of his masters the Florentines; which had so good an effect, that twenty of the chief citizens of Pisa were named to go to Florence, and there to make a formal surrender of their fovereignty to the magistracy. This was done with great pomp; and for some months nothing was heard in Florence but music of all kinds, and shouts of triumph; and nothing feen but feltivities, justs, tournaments, and magnificent processions.

LERIUS de Captivitato Pisarum, ibid, pag. 185.

Affairs of

ACCORDING to Aretin², the Florentine name never was the papacy. so renowned and glorious as it was upon the taking of Pifa. Their city became now the rendezvous of all the great and the polite amongst the Italians; and they behaved with so much tenderness and honour towards the Pisans, that they found no difficulty in reducing to their obedience all the Pifan territory, which, according to Palmerius, contained no fewer than eighty-four walled towns. This rendered them fo formidable, that none of their neighbours chufing to disturb them, they for some years continued in a state of tranquility, excepting when it was disturbed by the schism that still prevailed in the papacy, which at this time continued to divide all Europe. Upon the death of the anti-pope Innocent. the cardinals at Rome chose a Venetian, Angelo Corrario; but exacted a promise from him to abdicate the papacy, as soon as his competitor Peter de Luna should do the same, or as foon as the cardinals should think fit to proceed to a new election. Corrario, being chosen, was in no haste to sulfit his engagement, but trifled most egregiously with his electors, and avoided having any interview in order to compromise Corrario had taken the name of Gregory, and was attended by Aretin the historian, on the part of the Florentines, to Rimini, which was then in subjection to Carlo Malatesta, to whom Aretin gives a very high character. In the mean while, the Florentines, as well as the rest of Christendon, ashamed of the conduct of the two anti-popes, and the scandal thereby arising to the church, agreed that a council should be. held at Pifa, where both popes were folemnly deposed; and another, Philargi, a Greek by birth, being chosen, took the name of Alexander. This new pope was opposed by Ladislans king of Naples, who had done all he could to obstruct the meeting of the council at Pifa, and his holiness conferred the kingdom of Naples upon Lewis of Anjou, the fon of that ke, who had disputed it before with Charles of Durazzo. he Florentines took part with Lewis, and Ladislaus marched army into Tuscany, where he sat down before Arezzo, in pes of an infurrection within that city in his favour; but, ough he was disappointed in that, Cortona opened its gates him. He was, however, foon after obliged to return to In the mean while pope Alexander died, and an Ita- Death and n cotemporary historian b (A), who knew him well, gives character n excessive commendations for virtue and piety; only he of pope Is us, he was such an epicure that he spent half his time at Alexanble, and that he had forty wenches in his family all in the ne habit; but he attributes that piece of luxury to his beg a native of Greece.

^{*} ARETIN. rerum Italicarum Hist. p. 256.

NOTWITHSTANDING Alexander's death, the dispute be- War bereen Lewis of Anjou and Ladiflaus, about the crown of Na-tween Laes still continued, and the Florentines sent an army to the dislaus listance of the former, under the command of Paolo Ursini king of nd Sforza. Lewis was attended by Baldasar Cossa, who acted Naples the legate of pope Alexander. This person had been bred and the) a pirate, and acted in that capacity when he first took or- duke of us; afterwards, betaking himself to the land service, he 25 a great partizan of pope Urban, and amassed as much oney by maraudings and inroads, as bought him a cardinal's at. At last, he was made general for the pope, and legate Bologna, which he was the great means of recovering from e Visconti family. The cardinals being met for the election a new pope, chose this Cossa, who immediately assumed ie name of John XXIII. After remaining some time at Bogna, he marched by the way of Florence to Rome, which, ter various disputes, by this time, was recovered from Ladius. Ladislaus was encamped upon the frontiers of Naples, : Rocca Vecchia, and Lewis, with the Florentine army, adnced to fight him. Having a great fuperiority of numbers ter the Florentines, Ursini, the Florentine general, who bore o good will to Sforza, with most of the officers, were against ming to a battle. But Sforza remonstrating with great spit against the disgrace which their retreat would be attended ith, brought Lewis over to his opinion, and the army passed E Garigliano. Their army was drawn up in three divisions: be command of the first, which was to attack the Neapoli-

ρA

in front, was given to Sforzac, who was to be supported BILLIUS ubi supra. CRIBEL. de Vita Sfortiæ apud MURAT. tom. xix. p. 651.

⁽A) This pope Alexander was Galeazzo had put at the head the archbishop of Milan, whom of his regency at his death.

A. D.

1410.

Ladislaus

utterly defeated.

by the second, consisting of cavalry under Lewis kimself: while the third, under Ursini, was to wheel off in order to attack the enemy in their rear, where Ladiflaus himself was. It appears from our author, that that prince practifed a fratagem pretty frequent in those days, which was, that of dresfing up a number of officers in arms and robes not to be difcerned from his own. He was superior to Lewis, not only in the number, but in the discipline, appointments, and armour of his troops; and he had placed the flower of his army in his front. Sforza's charge was very furious, and Urfini breaking in during the heat of the dispute, Ladislaus was descated and put to flight, leaving behind him almost all his general officers, his camp, and an immense booty in the possession of the Florentines, whose general Sforza had the chief honour of the victory.

IT is on all hands agreed, that if the Florentines had purfued their blow, they might have placed Lewis upon the throne of Naples. According to some authors, the booty which both the officers and foldiers had acquired, was for immense that they did not chuse to risk the loss of it, and were impatient to return home. The writer of Sforza's life in forms us, that the glory Sforza had acquired, was so disagn able to Urfini, that the latter thwarted him in every measure he proposed. According to him, Sforza proposed parsuig Ladiflaus that very night, and laying fiege to St. Germans, i which he had taken refuge, and which probably would have furrendered had it been attacked before he had recovered from his configuration. This proposal was opposed by Urfai a the Florentine officers, who all of them treated it as roma and impracticable, and notwithstanding the earnestness of L to have it carried into execution, it was laid afide. N day, though Lewis protested against it, the army repassed Garigliano, and remained inactive during the rest of the Arctin b informs us, it was usual after this for Li flaus to fay, 'That the day on which he was defeated enemies had it in their power to have been masters better his person and kingdom; that the second day they might have been masters of his kingdom, though not of his p fon; but that the third day both his person and kingd " were out of their power."

Ladislaus retrieves

THE truth is, Ladiflaus, like a great man as he was, from desponding under his deseat, sought to prevent the bis affairs, sequences of it. He sent expresses through all his kingde for recruiting and remounting his troops; and ordering.

2 Vide CRIDEL. ubi supra.

b Page 257.

levies to repair, as they did in great numbers to St. Germano, he was again formidable, and that too chiefly through the aversion his subjects had to a French government. It appears, however, on the face of history, as if he owed his safety, and the happy turn his affairs took at this time, to a secret negotiation entered into between him and the Florentinus, by which he actually ceded, or, according to others, sold to them Cortona, which proved to them a valuable acquisition; and according to Florentine historians c, a peace at the same time was concluded upon between him and the Florentinus; but it must have been a peace only of conveniency on his side, for in a few weeks both parties were again in arms. This peace, however, had the effect of discouraging Lewis of Anjou to such a degree, that he returned to France, and gave over all thoughts of prosecuting his claims upon Naples.

LADISLAUS having thus gained the great point he aimed Sforza at, renewed his preparations for war. The Florentines had ferves the continued their troops and their generals in the service of pope, pope John, and that part of their army, which was commanded by Sforza, wintered in the dutchy of Spoleto. It had been agreed between the pope and the Florentines, that his holines should pay the troops in his service; but being unable to fatisfy Sforza's arrears, which amounted to seventeen thousand ducats, he created him count of Cotignola. Ursini. the other Florentine general, could not brook such an honour being conferred on his rival, whose original was scarcely known, and infifted upon the pope's difiniffing him from his hervice. His holiness durst not disablige Ursini, who was the head of one of the noblest families in Rome; and Sforza at less drawing together a few troops he still commanded, fortihimself on Selva d'Algieri, formerly called Mons Algidum. While he was in this fituation, he received a message from the pope, by a cardinal, inviting him to continue in his fervice, and offering him a fum of gold; but no way equal to the arrears due to him. Sforza rejected the money as not withy his acceptance, expressed the most prosound veneration towards the pope, but inveighed bitterly against Ursini, and declared he would continue no longer in the service of his holiness. Ladislaus, by this time, was advancing at the head of an army against Rome, and no sooner heard that Sorza had quitted the pope's service, than he offered him his own terms if he would enter into his.

THE bargain was foon struck: Sforza received money and then enough to pay off the arrears of his troops, and marched with Ladiflaus.

^{&#}x27; Istorie di Firenze dall' An. 1406 fino al 1438 apud MURAT.
ubi supra. Machiavel, book iii.

flying colours into the royal camp. The winter coming on, and provisions falling scarce in the Neapolitan army, nothing farther could be done that campaign. The troops were difmissed into winter-quarters; and Ladislaus not only made Sforza governor of Perugia, but raised him and his family to all the degrees of honour and riches that fovereignty could Most of the Florentine auxiliaries had lest Sforza, and continued to serve under Ursini, who was first in command. Early next spring Sforza was at the head of his troops, and marched against Ursini, who lay in the marquisate of Urfini de- Ancona; but was driven by him from place to place, till at last he was obliged to take refuge in Rocca Contrada, where he was belieged by Sforza and the other Florentine generals. THE Florentines, being thus in a manner left without a general, gave the command of their troops to Brachio, a Peragian nobleman; and Aretin intimates.4, he was so great a captain as to leave the palm of military glory doubtful between him and Sforza. He had been at first an exile from his country, and by his brave actions had acquired fo great renown, that the Florentines thought it a triumph when he accepted the command of their troops. After ferving them with great fidelity and success in Tuscany, he was sent with his army to the relief of pope John and Urfini, who continued still in danger of being utterly ruined by the Neapolitans. would swell this history too much should we enter into a de tail of all the brave actions performed by Brachio, in the course of this war. The writers of particular lives are apt magnify every successful skirmish into a glorious victory gain by their hero. It must, however, be owned in general, this Brachio's real exploits require no historical amplification recommend them; and it is acknowledged, that in civil vi tues he was superior to Sforza. While both those general ferved in subordinate capacities, the greatest friendship subsist between them; but they were no fooner raised to independ dent commands, than each conceived a mortal antipathy the other. While Sforza was governor of Perugia for La state other. White by 22 was governor of I eragia to Land and Bracket but generally to the advantage of the latter, because he will better acquainted with, and beloved in, the country. Af this, Brachio served with great honour and success in the I lognese, and was the means of reducing that city entirely the authority of the pope, who never before durst venture, check the inhabitants.

feated.

The Florentines create Brachio their geral.

His exploits.

WHILE Brachio was in the Bolognese, he received an: count of the disagreeable situation of Ursini, who still come

d Page 260.

I to be befieged in Rocca Contrada. The place was exvely strong, and could only be reduced by famine. The :, however, was obstinately carried on for three months Sforza and Malatesta, who was now in the Neapolitan ice; and Brachio resolved at all events to raise it. view he marched against Cefena, a flourishing town being to Malatesta, which, with its castle, he took, plund, and demolished. Ladiflaus, on the other hand, ordered pano, another of his generals, to reduce all the places nging to Brachio, in the Perugian territory. Upon this, chio marched to Borgo St. Sepulchro, on the Florentine fron-, and from thence to Montone, which he took, and id means to concert with Ursini his escape from Rocca rada, advising him to march to Ugubio, about ten miles int. If he was attacked in his march by the Neapoli-, Ursini was to expect no farther assistance from him, as main point must be then compassed, that of raising the e; but that if the enemy continued it, he was determined ttack them in their entrenchments, while he was to be ured by a brisk fally from the place. This scheme held, : besiegers drew off to oppose Brachio, and Ursini took He relieves opportunity of escaping with his garrison to Urbino, from Urfini. nce he joined Brachio; and thus Ursini was saved, by t the writer of Sforza's life thinks to be next to a miracle. : Neapolitans at this time had two armies in the field. of them superior in number to that of Brachio; but inor in military experience and discipline. One of the politan armies was then belieging Ponte Patulo, in the Pean territory. The other observed the motions of Brachio, could not prevail with Urfini to attempt the raifing of fiege by furprizing the enemy. After this Ursini marched broieto, and Brachio to Todi, and from thence to Mar-, a town belonging to himself in Perugia, which had ely held out against all the Neapolitan power in Tuscany. n his approach the Neapolitans raised the siege of Ponte who; and matters continued quiet in Tuscany during the ainder of the campaign. Ladislaus, however, still caron the war against pope John; but the active Brachio d means to make himself master of the important town edi, lying between Perugia and Rome. To repair this The pope , Ladiflaus took a great many strong places from the pope, flies to on he had expelled from Rome, and who had taken re-Florence. : in the state of Florence. THE Florentines were at this time greatly divided in their Parties in Notwithstanding the activity of Brachio and that city.

ir other generals, Ladiflaus was daily gaining ground, and was

was now become as formidable to them as Galeazzo had ever been. The pope's capacity seemed to be no ways suitable to his dignity: his authority was disowned by the greatest part of Christendom; and a great party amongst the Florentines thought that they had embarked already too far in his quarrel. Add to this, that a general council was, by this time, indicted at Constance, with the approbation of almost all the princes of Christendom, for settling the affairs of the church, and for chusing a new pope. Upon the whole, they were of opinion that Ladislaus ought not to be farther provoked.

into which he is not admitted.

THOUGH the Guelphs were still the prevailing party in Florence, yet the above confiderations were so plausible, that the pope was not invited into that city; but refided in a country-feat belonging to the archbishop. Perceiving the Florentines to be thus cold in his favour, he applied to the emperor Sigismund, by his cardinals, and offered, for the good of the church, to submit himself to a general council. The emperor was fatisfied with this proposal; but great difficulties arose as to the place where the council was to be held. The pope told Aretin, in confidence f, that he was refolved not tu agree to any place where the emperor's power was greater than his own. But at last, finding the state of his affair desperate, he gave the two cardinals, whom he sent as his legates to the emperor, full power to agree to any place which he and they should think most proper. After various conferences, the city of Conftance was agreed to by the 18gates, to the great chagrin of the pope, though he obliged to conceal it.

Ambition of Ladi-

By this time Ladiflaus had failed in an expedition against Bologna, the command of which he had given to the marde d'Este, who could not, without jeasousy, behold the grow ing power of Ladiflaus in Italy. The latter, however, mad a great acquisition in bringing over to his service Urshi, will now became as determined an enemy of the Florentine gent ral, as Sforza had been before. This accession of strength was very agreeable to Ladiflaus, as Ursini carried with him well disciplined body of troops, who were very ineful in the fiege of Todi, which was still carried on with twenty-eigh thousand men; a force sufficient to have subdued all Tuscall which was the real aim of Ladiflaus. Brachio's force did not exceed three thousand; but with them he did wonders. Le diflaus at first blockaded the place, and destroyed the country round, which induced the citizens to fend some of the chiefs to treat of a furrender; one of the terms of which we

that Brachio and the Florentine forces might retire to where they thought proper. It was with difficulty that Ladifians could be brought to agree to this last article; and Brachio retiring to Fratta in the Perugian, five hundred Neapolitan infantry took possession of Todi; but the new garrison behaved with fuch brutality, that the inhabitants expelled them, and recalled Brachio, and thus the fiege recommenced. fence which Brachio made was so noble, and his behaviour so generous, especially to some Neapolitan noblemen, whom he had made prisoners in a fally, that Ladistaus invited him to a private conference, in which he offered him very high terms if he would enter into his service, which Brachio, like a man of honour, rejected, and thereby encreased the king's esteem of him. During this siege, Sforza is said to have Generosity faved Ursimi from being taken prisoner, notwithstanding the of Sforza. enmity tublisting between them. At last, after Ladislaus had fpent four and twenty days without any prospect of taking the place, he withdrew his army to Perugia, where, upon suspicion, he put Ursini under arrest. Perceiving his health lan- Death of guishing, he returned by the way of Rome to Naples, where Ladislaus. he died in August 1414, leaving his sister Yoanna, dutchess of A. D. Austria, heir to his kingdom. Thus, the Plorentines were once more faved, by the critical death of a prince, who was their determined enemy, and who found no check but Firthice to prevent his becoming master of all Italy. His death being known to Sforza, who had been left behind to command against Brathio, he put every thing into the best poflure he could in the marquifate of Ancona, and marched to secure Rome in the obedience of his new mistress. The time now approached for the meeting of the general council at Conflance. Pope John and the emperor Sigismund had several inter- Interview views with one another, and they had been continued for some between months at Placentia, Cremona, and other places in Lombardy; the embut all the effect of them was, that each conceived for the peror and other a concealed hatred; and the pope, taking his leave of poper the emperor, passed the winter at Mantua, from whence he went to Bologna, where he was when he received news of the death of Ladiflaus. But having faithfully promised the emperor that he would attend the council of Constance, and submit to whatever it should decree, he now found himself under a necessity of repairing to that city. Before he set out, he ordeted Brachio, who was then with his army in Ancona, to repair to Bologna, to take upon him the government of it in his abience. According to some, the design of his holiness was to put Brachio to death, in which case the Perugians had promised to submit to the holy see; and the pope would have been tiup quit of a large arrear owing him for pay. It is certain Brachio suspected somewhat of this; for when he came attended only by his own domestics to pay his respects to the pope, he had scarce entered the city when he returned with the utmost hafte to his camp, and commenced hostilities in the Bolognese. Whatever the intention of the pope might be, he saw that Brachio was his master, and a few days effected a reconciliation, by which Brachio was put into full possession of the government of Bologna, and all its revenues. Florence was then so persectly at peace with all the neighbouring powers, that she had no occasion to recal Brachio; nor were her civil contentions at this time at all dangerous, though the animolities amongst the chief citizens were far from being extinguished. But the leading families had suffered to much each in their turn, that they were contented to remain quiet under the present government, till a proper opportunity for renewing their claims should offer itself.

in tranquility.

Florence

THIS shew of tranquility, which, according to Machiavel, continued for about eight years after the death of Ladislaw. was greatly owing to the suspense in which the minds of all Europe, those of the Florentines particularly, were kept, by what passed at the council of Constance; to which city the pope repaired on the twenty-eighth of October; and Sigifmund, who had now been crowned emperor at Aix-la-Chepelle, followed him the twenty-third of December after. Next day the emperor performed the deacon's office, as is usual on fuch occasions, in the imperial Dalmatic, at a midnight male celebrated by the pope pontifically, but without the humiliating circumstances of being barefooted, of holding the pope's stirrup, or leading his mule by the bridle. The meeting was one of the most splendid that had ever been seen in Europe. According to Areting, the emperor was attended by no fewer than thirty thousand horse. The pope presided at the coun-Three thrones were erected in the cathedral, one for Constance the pope, one for the empress, and one between both for the Council of cil. beld.

Of the German princes were present, the elecemperor. tors of Saxony, Palatine, and Mentz; the administrator of Brandenburg; the dukes of Bavaria, Austria, and Silesia; one hundred and twenty-eight counts, two hundred barons, and twenty-seven ambassadors from sovereign princes or states. In all the articles of luxury, debauchery, and revelling, it resembled a carnival, rather than a council of venerable sathers. The Florentines, like other sovereign states, had their deputies there; but they were generous enough not to defeat pope John, though in fact he abandoned himself. The fathers, after various deliberations, came to a resolution that John, as well as the two antipopes, Angelo Carrario, Peter de Luna, should resign their dignities.

70HN, who presided at the council, agreed to those terms, provided his two competitors could be brought to agree to them likewise; adding, that he was willing to abdicate the popedom in all cases wherein any such abdication could be of advantage to the church. He had no fooner made this de-. claration, than the emperor, descending from his throne, threw himself at John's feet, to thank him for it, in the name of all Christian princes; and the patriarch of Antioch followed his example, in the name of all Christian eccle-This submission of John was mortifying to the secret enemies of the emperor in Germany, particularly the archbishop of Mentz, and Frederick duke of Austria; and they tampered with him to retract it, in which they pre-John had some colour for this, from the council being overawed by the imperial forces. He, therefore, difguised himself like a postilion, and sled to Schaffbausen. The cardinals who had attended him knew nothing of his intention, and repaired to Schaff hausen to persuade him to return: but all was to no purpose. This conduct of John exasperated the council and the emperor fo greatly, that he was now formally deposed, and all Christians were commanded to pay no obedience either to him or to the two anti-popes. The duke of Austria, perceiving the emperor and the council to be frictly united together, arrested John, as he was endeavouring to escape to Burgundy, threw him into prison, and then asked pardon on his knees of the emperor for what he had done. John being now in custody, and deserted by those on whom he had mostly depended (for the Florentines seem to have given him no encouragement either in his flight or retractation) now lost all spirit, and resolved to submit in the sullest manner to his enemies. He accordingly freely renounced the papacy, and laid afide all the badges of that dignity. Gre- Transacgery XII. for Corrario had assumed that name, who then re-tions there. fided at Rimini, under the protection of Malatesta, followed his example; but Benedict XIII. as de Luna called himself, refused to submit to the authority of the council, being supported by the kings of Castile, Arragon, and Navarre; for whose fidelity to the council the emperor made himself answerable. Zafarella, who had been made bishop and cardinal of Florence by John, was highly instrumental in persuading him to his first abdication; and he and the Florentines continued afterwards to do him eminent services. The council cil proceccied next to the election of a new pope, and this choice fell upon Otto, or Otho Colonna, of a noble Roman family, who assumed the name of Martin V. of whom the Florentine historian gives this character, that before his election he was esteemed rather generous than wife, but after it he gave the greatest proofs of his wisdom, but was far stom being excessive in his generosity. The rest of the transactions of this council, which was noted for the infamous murders of John Hufs, and Jerome of Prague, are well known to the public, and have no relation to this work.

Pope Mar-

THE election of Martin into the papal fee was extremely tin comes to agreeable to the Florentines; and upon the breaking up of the Florence; council, he came from Constance by the way of Milan, Mantua, Ferrara, Ravenna, and Forli, to Florence, where he refided for two years, as being the most commodious place for negotiating the affairs of the church, and the states of stalk. The felf-deposition of pope John, who now refumed his former name of Cossa, had not procured him his liberty; for he languished long after in prison. At last he was delivered by the generous interpolition of the Florentines, whe made Martin fensible, that it was by no means for his interest to use him with farther rigour. Several of the state! who had acknowledged Cossa as pope, being diffatisfied both with the emperor and the council, began to entertain scruple: about the validity of his abdication, as being extorted by force. It was easy to foresce the consequences of those doubts in a country so disaffected to the emperor as Germany, where Coffa was imprisoned, then was; and Martin himself procured his deliverance from his confinement in Bavaria, and invited him to Flirence, with a fecret view of feizing upor him on his journey, and shutting him up in perpetual impriforment at Mantua. Coffa arriving in Lombardy, was informet by some of his Florentine friends, of Martin's intention; upor which he took refuge in the Genecle territories. After remaining there, in a most miserable plight, for some time, he was encouraged by the experience he had of the spirit of this Florentine people and government, to repair to that city, ant without reserve to throw himself at Martin's feet, and to re cognize his authority. No fooner was his approach knowl than the Florentines, in prodigious numbers, flocked out ti meet and welcome him. The distressed appearance he made ferved only to encrease their affection and compassion toward him; and he was introduced to the pope, with all Florent attending him as his intercessors and protectors. they perfuaded Martin, that the only way to prevent any ba consequences from Cossa's party, would be to restore to his

as does Cossa.

his cardinal's hat, and to the exercise of his sacred functions, which Martin wisely agreed to, and Cossa died about a year after.

We have already seen, that Brachio was lest by pope John governor of Bologna, where his service against the neighbouring states, who were encouraged and protected by that pope's enemies, was sharp and active; but he generally was victorious. The Bolognese, however, disliking the severity of his The Bogovernment, and his exactions, to which he was in some lognese measure compelled by the poverty of that pope, took advan-revolt. tage of his absence to attempt a revolt; but before they could maffer the citadel, Brachio appeared before their gates, and obliged them to submit. Soon after, being called out to a fresh expedition against the Riminians and the Perugians, the Bolognese again revolted; but more unanimously and resolutely than they had done before. But Brachio, who had taken care to provide the citadel with a good garrison, and store of provisions, returned with incredible expedition; and, after a most obstinate dispute, he was beaten off, and was forced to The citizens commence a regular siege against the city. held out with great courage, till he was obliged to change the siege into a kind of blockade, by taking possession of all the avenues by which the city could receive any provisions: and then the magistrates sent him a deputation of their most respectable citizens, asking pardon for what had happened. and laying the blame upon the rabble, who had taken arms against their will. Brachio, with great feeming difficulty, again pardoned them, and obliged them to deliver fifty of their principal citizens as hostages for their future behaviour. In the mean while, hearing of the deposition of pope John, and the election of Martin, he fold Bologna, and all its dependencies, to the inhabitants for eighty thousand ducats, with which he paid and recruited his army, and bent all his efforts to the reduction of Perugia, his native city, which had expelled the Neapolitan garrison, and recovered its indepen-The pretext was, that the Perugians had broken their league with the Florentines, and was governed by a faction, who had exiled Brachio and all its worthy citizens. Upon his approach the Perugians recalled the Neapolitan gatrison, and took into their pay Ursini, who was by this time delivered from his imprisonment at Naples. Brachio, however, took his measures so well, that neither Chicolini, the Neapalitan general, nor Ursini, could throw themselves into Peru-Bia; and the Pirugians were diffressed so greatly, that they ent deputies to the Florentines to mediate between them and Brachio.

They accordingly fent a deputation to his a Brachio. exhorting him to listen to an accommodation.

Proceedings of Brachio.

THOUGH Brachio was then the Florentine general acted by their authority, yet he had so long served in a of independent capacity, and he had so great a passion master of Perugia, that he, in fact, refused to desist fro enterprize, and dismissed the deputies with an unsatisfi answer. He then proceeded to take all the adjacent for towns, and gave a total defeat to Chicolini and Malatesta. were on their march to the relief of Perugia, both of being taken prisoners. Upon this, the city was surrende Brachio and the other exiles, and he is said to have exe the government of it with great lenity and justice.

THE Florentines beheld Brachio's successes with great difference, as they were affured of his fidelity to their and that they could always controul him in any undue cise of his power. But we return to the other conce Florence, which had now no overgrown tyrant to dread.

Designs of Milan,

JOHN, the eldest son and successor of Galeazzo. I the duke of been affaffinated by his subjects, was succeeded by his b Philip, who resembled his father and grandsather in qualities and ambition, and by some is said to have ex them in both. He foon recovered the affairs of his fa then languishing and disordered through the weaknes divisions of his brother's ministers, and, like his ancestor came formidable to Florence. Philip, having an eye Genoa, was encouraged to attempt making himself man that noble city by the numerous Genoese exiles whor French government and internal factions had driven to bardy. Before he entered upon this expedition, he so sa quered his natural aversion to the Florentines, that he most splendid embassy to Florence, offering that state his i ship and alliance. No formal embassy had been see twenty years before from the court of Milan to the 1 tines 2, Nicola de Uzano was then the chief man of the rentine state, and he was employed to treat with the M ambassadors, whose instructions were to negociate a treaty between Philip and the Florentines; by which Pa or the river Magra, were to be the boundaries, and beyond neither the Milanese nor the Florentines were to extend dominion. The Florentines, in general, were averse 1 proposition, because the limits proposed by Philip se boundary of the two states, plainly indicated his design Genoa. Uzano, however, and the wifer part of the 1

^{*} BILLII Historia, ubi supra, p. 57.

tines, who had experienced the sweets of peace, gave the Milanese ambassadors a most polite reception, and the treaty was concluded.

THOMAS FREGOZO was then doge of Genoa; who makes but being unable to make head against the duke of Milan, himself for want of money, he sold Leghorn, a place then inconsistantly master of detable, to the Florentines for one hundred and twenty thou. Genoa. sand ducats, most of which was spent in raising soldiers in the Florentine state. This was, by Philip, considered as a breach of the new-made treaty; but he dissembled his resentment for the time. Carmignola was then both general and first minister of state to Philip, and conducted the expedition against Genoa so successfully, that the doge, being beaten both by sea and land, was obliged to surrender Genoa into Carmignola's hands; and Philip afterwards became master of all that sea-coast, to the great terror and amazement of the Florentines.

POPE Martin still remained at Florence; but, from what has Pope Marfallen from Aretin b, he was by no means popular there, and tin's difaffrontive ballads were even fung under his windows in his content. hearing. Aretin then attended him, as he had done his predecessors, and it required all his address to keep his holiness in temper. But Brachio, who still acted in the character of Florentine general, having defeated all his enemies, and being now master of Perugia, was of the atmost importance to the pope, for recovering the towns and cities that had been difmembered from the Holy See, and possessed by separate tyrants. He was accordingly, with confent of the Florentine magistracy, appointed general to the pope. In a short time he reduced a Success of great number of those places; and it was in this campaign Brachio. that the famous Nicolo Picinino, then a common soldier, gave the first proofs of his military genius. His success obliged the tyrants of all the revolted places to apply to him for peace; and Brachio, to give the greater lustre to his own name and character, appointed Florence for the place of negociation. Thither he repaired with a train and equipages fuitable to a fovereign prince; and as such he was received not only by the Florentines c, but by the pope himself. His historian has described the wonderful magnificence that reigned at Florence during his abode there, and the pompous justs and tournaments he exhibited. His vast popularity, however, gave umbrage to the pope, who, by the advice of Sforza, who was at Florence at the same time, employed him in the reduction of

ARETIN, pag. 259. abi fupra, p. 563.

^c Vita Brachii, apud Muraт.

Belogna, which had once more afferted its independency views of his holiness, in giving Brachio this commission, unknown to the Florentines, whose constant maxim vsuffer neither the pope nor any other prince to become powerful in Italy. Sfarza made Martin sensible that the rentines would oppose the growth even of the papacy and persuaded him, that he had now an opportunity of ing to the Holy See the kingdom of Naples, which we verped by a weak silly woman, to the great disgust Neapolitans.

Factions at Florrence,

BRACHIO, who seems to have had a good deal. nity in his composition, accepted of his new commission great joy; and the Florentines, who now thought then at peace with all the world, applied affiduoufly to cu learning and the fine arts, and were therefore the less sol about an army within their territories. According to 1/2. vel d, the citizens next in authority to Nicola de Uzano, Bartolomeo Valore, Nero Nigi, Reinaldo Albizi, Neri di and Lupe Nicolini. On the other hand, the families i grace were the Alberti, the Ricci, and de Medici, Bu long possession of power, and the continuance of a volu peace, had by this time so far insected the Florentine go ment, that their magistrates became proud, insolent, at gligent. They were, it is true, united in their fentime civil independency, and, in general, were well affect their conflitution. But the vast riches they possessed ha troduced amongst them a spirit of pride, that is income with the manners of republicans. Each great man another, and was glad to throw upon his brother-mag the blame of every abuse in the state. By those mutual ju fies, the Florentines at last conceived a distaste at their go ment, which laid the first foundations of the greatness house of Medici, who had always been moderate in their timents of civil affairs, and foon after became fovereign The difgraced families foon perceived the va the state. vantage which the misconduct of the governing party into their hands; and Giovanni Ricci was the first wh the courage to offer himself to be the patron and protect the people. He was strenuously opposed by Nicolo de U. but his greatness had created so much jealousy amongs other magistrates, that he was not listened to. The anis against him was greatly favoured by the progress of . duke of Milan; and he was fally, perhaps, accused of the chief instrument of concluding the treaty between where the Medici gain ground.

d Machiavel, book iv.

and the Florentines. According to Machiavel c, in the pacification he made with the doge of Genoa, he referred Screzana, and some other towns on the side of the Magra, next to Florence, in his own possession; which the Florentines complained of as a breach of their treaty with him. The magittracy of Florence would willingly have winked at this iniraction; but the people would not suffer them. Notwithflanding all the remonitrances that were made against entering into war with a prince to powerful as Philip, and the impossibility of keeping any of the conquests they could gain. from him, while the Romagna lay between the two states, preparations for war were resolved upon, levies made, and the ten field deputies nominated. No sooner was this resolution approved of, than the people, feeling the weight of the taxes that were necessary for carrying on the war, redoubled their murmurs against the government. Ordelaff, the lord of Forli, dying about this time, had left his ion under the tutelage of Philip duke of Milan; but the mother, disliking such a guardian, sent her child to her father Luigi Alidosso, lard of Imola. This incensed the inhabitants of Imola so greatly, that they obliged the mother to put her fon into the hands of the guardian appointed by the father; and thus Philip became master of that state. This new acquisition of power to Philip renewed the jealousy of the Florentines. Great debates were held about the expediency of declaring war war against him, which John de Medici earnestly opposed. He against the thought, that, as Philip had not as yet proceeded to hostili-duke or ties, the Florentine allies would look upon them as the ag-Milan. gressors, if they should declare war. The opposite party held forth the folly of making their own country the teene of war, with a prince who they were fure was their enemy. epinion of the latter prevailed, and a war was resolved upon.

PHILIP, having intelligence of this, immediately sent Aguelo of Pergola at the head of an army against the lord of Imela, in order to divert him from succouring Forli. It was then the depth of winter; and the waters of the ditches, which formed the chief desence of the place, being frozen, Aguelo took the city, and sent Alidosso prisoner to Milan. Upon this the Florentines, who had now completed their levies, laid siege to Forli; while Agualo of Pergola, unable to succour it, besieged Zoganara, in hopes that the Florentines would raise the siege of Forli, in order to relieve the some count Alberico was then in the pay of the Florentines; and his garrison held out Zoganara, which was so prest by the enemy, that the besieged were obliged to agree to deliver up the town, if it was not relieved within fifteen days by the Florentines. The terms of this capitulation to greatly incenfed the Florentines, that they resolved, at all hazards, to raise the siege. Abandoning that of Forli, they began their march towards Zoganara in the beginning of February, though the roads were almost impassable, and the scason bitter; and attacking the duke of Milan's army, they were so totally defeated, that all Florence was thrown into conflernation. give the reader some conception of the manner in which war was carried on at this time, we are to inform him, that, in this total defeat of the Florentine army, no more than three people were killed; and those, too, not by the enemy, but by falling off their horses, and being suffocated in the mire.

[&]quot; MACHIAVEL, book iv.

The Florentines defeated.

The Florentines murmur against their government.

THIS defeat, if such it may be termed, opened the mouths of the meaner fort of people against their government. They complained, that the war with the duke of Milan had been entered into by their magistracy only to divert their attention to public liberty, which was now endangered. This discontent ran so high, that the magistrates were obliged to. fummon a general affembly of the people; in which Rinalde; Albizi, fon to Maso, endeavoured to apologize for the conduct of the government, notwithstanding the disagreeable. turn the war had taken. He then attempted to prove that the carrying the war into the Romagna had averted it from Tuscany, and had been of singular service to the Holy See; and that, as it was a war now of defence, it would be far from being burdensome to the people. By his authority and persuasions the people were somewhat quieted; and they took, into their pay Odo, or Otho, the son of Brachio, a youth of seventeen years of age, but under the tutelage of Nicolo Pict-, The name of Brachio was of great fervice to the Flat. rentines, as his father's friends repaired to his standard.

Their civil

Bur by this time the people began to perceive the diffdiffentions culties and distresses under which their leaders laboured, which renewed. they gueffed at, partly from their countenances, and partly from the great weight of their taxes. In a short time the city was thrown into a kind of a civil war. The inferior rank refused to pay their imposts; and the magistrates were force to appoint twenty citizens in the nature of tax-gatherers, an threw the chief burden of the public expence upon the notion lity. This was a treatment the latter could not endure. power was given to the new collectors to kill any one t refused to pay their taxes; by which the whole city soon became a scene of violence, consusion, and murder. bility, and the chief citizens, to the number of above seventy; met in St. Stephen's church; but John Medici, the most popular nobleman in Fin ence, was not present, the others, ignorant of what part he inight act, not having summoned him; and he himself disliking the cause of the meeting. The assembly was opened by a speech from Rinaldo Albizi, who set forth the deplorable state of the nobility, extolled the behaviour of their ancestors on such occasions, and counselled them by all means to unite in shaking off the yoke of the plebeians. Rinaldo's speech was greatly to the liking of the assembly; but Nicolo Uzano objected to their doing any thing by force, without the concurrence of John de Medici, who was always the professed patron of the people. He proceeded likewise to remonstrate upon the uncertain event of a civil war, and upon the impracticability of their deliberations, without consulting John de Medici. Rinaldo undertook that tak, and acquitted himself in a very artful manner, but without fuccefs. John informed him, that he could agree to no alteration in the state to the projudice of the people; and that Rinaldo, in what he was doing, was but the tool of others, who would foon get the upper hand, and ruin him; and that, from the whole, moderation and a little forbearance were belt; and particularly, that the citizens should be free from arrefts by creditors on the days of public meetings; and that, for his part, he was refolved to oppose the factious of erery kind.

An answer so suil of wisdom and moderation increased the Virtue of pularity of Medici, who now withdrew himself from all John Metecabals of the nobility; so that it was in his credit to have dici. The himself lord of Florence. His family and relations after him to avail himself of his credit and popularity, to revenged upon his enemies; but John was too good a pator to listen to their advice. Rinaldo de Albizi, however, the rest of his faction, attempted to displace Martin, one the secretaries of state, because he was a friend to the Metecation. But he was so far from succeeding, that Pagolo, tho was in Rinaldo's interest, was turned out, and Martin withhed more firmly than ever.

Ir happened at this time, luckily for Florence, that the no-Conduct of had but little credit with the people; so that they were the dute of condition to resent those mortifications as they were Milan, and to do. Add to this, that Philip duke of Milan, and compromised his differences with the Malatesta family, his other neighbours, continued obstinately bent upon lop. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

the reduction of Florence. He had taken into his pay Angelo. or Agnolo of Pergola, and Carmignola, both of them able officers, the latter of whom was then in the Bologuefe, endeavouring to reduce Bologna, which had submitted itself to pope Martin, by the persuasion of Bentivoglio, its late master. Philip had likewise been very successful in extending his frontiers towards Savey and the foot of the Alps. Being a complete master of dissimulation, he sent an honourable exchasiv to Florence to treat of peace; but peither fide being fincere, hostilities still went on, and the Florentines in vain endeavoured to retake Forli. This induced them to name ambas fadors on their parts; and they committed the management of the negociation to Bartolonico Valori, a man by no means rubo affronts the ambassador.

fuited for fuch an employment, being vain and oftentations (C) When he came to Lodi, he was given to understand, from Philip, that he must advance no farther into Lembardy, under Florentine pretence of the plague's being at Florence. This was a dread ful check to Valori, who returned directly to Florence, where upon his arrival, every thing was in a flame, at the contemptuous treatment of their ambassador by Philip, who was then master of Genoa. Fulgoso, the late doge, was furnished by the Florentines with troops and money to attempt the reco very of that state; and he succeeded so far as to conquer! great part of the Genoese sea-coast, and to create a great des of trouble to Philip. The Florentines seemed now resolved risque the whole of their state against Philip, who had sight cret eye to the crown of Naples. He addressed the pers complaining of his partiality for the Florentines, whom he cused of fomenting diffentions between the legate and people of Bologna. He prevailed fo far, that the pope shaugh his legate, and substituted in his place one who was intime in the interest of Philip. By this and other favourable cumstances, Philip regained his credit at Belogna, and quired Imola, and a great many important places in the magna. At the same time he endeared to himself the testa family; for having taken prisoner Charles, the loter Rimini, he treated him and all his friends in the mother nerous affectionate manner, and dismissed them wife rantom. 150

> (C) Billius, the Milanese historian, fays that the Florentines at this time, to recommend themselves to the Italian and other states, embroidered upon their arms and enfigues thio cient Roman instription, & Q.R. thereby intimating, the state of Florence was the representative of old Rome .- -

DURING this gloomy state of the Florentine affairs, and The Florentine when Philip had actually invaded their dominions, they re-rentines ceived some relief, by being befriended by Antonio, lord of joined by Facuza; and, according to the Milanese historian, Philip's ge-Antonio of nerals, particularly Agnolo, was not fond of putting an end Faenza. to the war. The causes, through which this event happened, are variously related. The most probable are, that Antonio had a personal deslike to Philip, and a kindness for the Florentines; which was increased by another event which took place about the fame time: for young Odo, and Nicolo Piciafter performing many important fervices to the Florentimes about Arezzo and the vale of Mugelli, were intirely defeated by the Milanese generals. Odo was killed on the spot; but Nicolo, endeavouring to escape, was taken by the peasants, and carried to Faenza, where he persuaded Antonio to declare bimielf for the Florentines against Philip. Upon this the city Florence, by a public decree and deed, declared him the chief of her allies, and fent a confiderable body of her troops protect Faenza from the refentment of Philip. This insident changed both the object and the scene of the war. Whilip was obliged to recal Agnolo; and the Florentines, glad remove the feat of war from their own country, gave the tommand of their army to Bernardino. Torelli, the Milanese general, marched to fight him; and both armies came to a tettle near Angleria, in which the Florentines were descated, and their general taken prisoner, together with his chief Aretin & himself scems to blame the Florentine ra- Their rapaciousness and crueity for this disaster, which was followed paciousness. mother. Nicolo Picinino, the best general they had then Tuscany, thought his services very indifferently requited by Florentines, and complained, that his person was neither regarded, nor his troops paid. As he was a foldier of fortune. and of very mean original, the Florentines imagined that he wanted to raise his terms, and they disregarded his comhits; so that, when the time of his service elapsed, he refirst to Cortena, then to Paragia, and then entered into showice of the duke of Milan. THE Florentines now gave themselves up for loft. Their 700 1/1 frances were exhausted. They had neither men nor general; "tir take the field, and their enemies were powerful. Nicolo "2" " the from them all their fores between Bibienna and Areszo; hat the Plorentines had then no other resource but that of applying to the Venetiers, who they thought were equally

8 Aretik, p. 261

lefted with themselves in opposing the growth of the dike

of Milan's power. Philip was sensible that the Florentines bore him no good will; and his chief general Carmignola, having lest his service in disgust, was now at Venice, and took part with the Florentines. He had recourse to his usual arts; and perceiving that the Venetians were determined to unite themselves to the Florentines, he offered peace to the latter, provided they would break off the negociation; but the condition was rejected. He then offered the same terms to the Venetians; but met with a like repulse from them.

History of between Venetians.

THE head of the Florentine deputation at Venice at this the league time was Lorenzo Rhidolphi, a man of address and abilities, who found means to fix the doge in his interest; and he conthe Floren-tinued to be seconded by Carmignola, who, according to Antines and tin h, had poison privately administered to him by Philip's order. The terms of agreement, after great difficulty, were at last settled between the Florentines and the Venetians. The chief were, that the Florentines should furnish four thousand foot, and that they should conclude no separate peace without the knowledge and confent of the Venetians. The full effect of this confederacy was the Venetians laying fiege to Brescia, which alarmed Philip so greatly, that he recalled all his troops out of Tuscany. The Florentines were thereby left at liberty to divide their army. One part of it was fent to make good their engagements with the Venetians, and the other was employed in retaking the towns and forts between Bibienna and Arezzo. The condition of Philip at this time is a fitting proof of the danger of a prince employing mercenaries. Philip was neither without troops nor money, and he had found means to engage in his service the best generals in Italy; for both Sforza and Brachio were now dead, the fifth being drowned, and the latter killed. But their animolities and avarice disconcerted his most important operations. Brefcia, though a very strong city, and well provided with every thing for a good defence, furrendered to the Venetians; as did Bergamo, and many other places in Lombardy. He likewife yielded up Forli and Imola, much against the inclinations of the Florentines, to pope Martin, with all the towns and territories belonging to them. The pope then mediated a peace Peace pro- amongst the states at war, and employed the cardinal of Bologna to conclude it. Philip was so ill served by his troops and generals, that he was forced to agree to all the terms prescribed by his enemies. The city of Milan, however, All posed,

Danger of mercenary troops.

stood by him, and had grown to fuch a height of power, that her inhabitants offered to furnish him with ten thousand horse and ten thousand soot, if he would continue the war against Venice and Florence. This offer for some time put a stop to the conclusion of the peace; but the Venetians preparing to and conrenew the war with more vigour than ever, it was at last con-cluded. cluded.

--4

ACCORDING to Machiavel 1, this war was carried on be-Inflances of tween the Florentines and the Milanese with prodigious ran-rancour, Braggio del Milano, governor of Monte Petroso, a little inconsiderable castle, being besieged by the Milanese, who had fet fire to the place, rather than furrender, threw his moveables and children to the enemy, but chose himself to perish in the flames, though he was offered an honourable capitulation. The Milanese, admiring his magnanimity, sent his children and all his effects to Florence, where they were amply provided for at the public charge. He gives us another instance of the detestation of treachery in Agnolo, the Milanese and of general, when he appeared before Galutea, a town or castle bonour. in the Romagna, where Zanobi del Pino was governor. Zambi not only furrendered the place to him, without the smallest desence, but offered to conduct the Milanese army into Tuscany, where he might make war with more profit and fafety. Agnolo's detestation of this proposal was such, that he delivered the traitor up to be punished by his own menial fervants, who, for some days, gave him nothing but paper painted with snakes and serpents to eat; so that he died of hunger. According to the last peace concluded with Philip, the Florentines were put in possession of all the places that had been taken from them in the Romagna; but, by Machiawe's account, the whole of the war cost them the amazing fun of three millions and a half of ducats. This expence was but ill repaid by the re-acquisitions they had gained; while the Venetians, at the charge of the Florentines, were now in to rich and respectable a condition, that they became suspected by their allies; and this, according to the same author, was one of their main motives for making a peace.

DURING this wan, which lasted from 1422 to 1427, the A new tax Fiorentine government had pursued every expedient they could impessed at devise for raising money; but, all being ineffectual, they at Florence. last laid a tax upon the properties and land estates of the subjects. This tax was called catosto; and Machiavel says, that it obliged every man possessed of an hundred florins to pay one half of them to the state. This, however, is to be understood with many restrictions. The value of the landed intense was known; and the plebeian part of the government, which now prevailed in Florence, could eafily raise the tax. It met, however, with a vigorous opposition; but was as strenuously supported by John de Medici, because it was to be levied by law, and could not be misapplied, to gratify the purposes either of avarice or revenge. The landed interest and great men were obliged to submit; but the people fought to carry the matter to an unwarrantable length, by wanting to inflitute courts of inquiry upon those who for some time past had paid less than that affessment. This project was unjust, cruel, and impolitic, and as such opposed by John de Medici, whole principle always was moderation in matters of government. In the year 1428, the nobility and rich citizens, finding they could not remove from their own shoulders the weight of the public burdens, suggested to the officers who collected the revenue, that the catasto ought to extend to all cities and states subject to the Florentines k. This proposal, far from being difliked, was carried into execution; and the subjects of all the acquired territories were ordered to give up schedules of their estates, that they might be taxed to the catasto. This produced remonstrances from all those cities and states, pleading their original contracts with the Florentines, which left them to be taxed by themselves; and numerous deputies were fent from all quarters, to expose the iniquity of such proceed-Those deputies, upon their arrival, and making known their business, were immediately put under confinement in Florence; so that the prisons there were filled with the principal inhabitants of Pifa, Volterra, Pistoia, Arezzo, Cortona, and other places.

MACHIAVEL, book iv.

Complained of by the cities.

The Volwolt.

AMONGST those the Volterrans were the most clamorous, terrans re- pleading, that, by their original contract, they ought to be considered rather as allies than subjects of Florence. One of the Volterran deputies was Justus, a man, says our authority 1, worthy to have lived in a better state, who counselled his countrymen and fellow-prisoners to make their submission to the Florentines, till better times should present themselves. This advice was followed, and the Volterran deputies were fuffered to return home. There he opened his mind to a very few of his intimate friends, particularly to one Giovanni, a fellow-prefident; and though all appearances of fuccess were against them, they no sooner proclaimed liberty to their fellowcitizens than the Florentine governor was seized, and Justus was acknowledged as lord of Velterra.

^{*} Billius, ubi supra, p. 117. MACHIAVEL, book iv. 1 Billius, ibid.

WHEN this news reached the Florentines, who had held but are the Velterrans to cheap that they had not to much as kept a with diffigarrison in their city, they were not so much affected with the culty rerevolt, as alarmed at the example which it might fet to the duced. other leading towns in their subjection. A council of the chief magistrates being held, some were generous enough to propose a remission of the tax, by adhering to the terms of the original Ripulations. But this opinion was over-ruled by the party who were for the tax, and who represented, that, being at peace with the duke of Milan, they had nothing to fear in Tufcany. Two commissaries, Rinaldo Aibizi, and Palia Strezzi, were appointed to treat with the Victorians; and, if they should find that impracticable, to reduce them by force. Palla was the most unexceptionable Florentine that could be employed in such a commission, because of the lenity he had always expressed towards the Volterrans, and the other states; to that the chief management of the affair was left to him, and he conducted it with great art. Knowing that Juflus, the new lord of Velterra, being but a plebeian, was hated by the nobility and the richer citizens of Volterra, when he came within eight miles of that city, he prevailed with many such b give him a meeting at a little town called Gamhazio, where be endeavoured to make them sensible of the folly of the Volterrans, in drawing upon themselves the resentment of the Florentines, whom they were unable to refift ". The Volterat first complained bitterly of the Florentine tyranny; but he promising to stand their friend in the Florentine government, for procuring a redress of their grievances, they all of them came over to his proposal, which was to employ their interest in bringing their city back to the subjection of Florence.

JUSTUS, sensible of the strong party formed against him, and of the Florentine power, applied for assistance to the neighbouring states. The Siennese excused themselves on account of their league with Florence; and Paolo Guinigi, then lord of Lucca, that he might re-ingratiate himself with the Florentines, to whom his conduct in the late war had given umbrage, sent his deputy prisoner to Florence. In the mean while, the Florentine commissioner to Florence. In the mean while, the Florentine commissioner had affembled all the troops they could out of the neighbouring garrisons and countries, and drew near to Voltarra, to second the efforts of their friends within the place. Justus, perceiving he had now no resource but in his own valour, and the strength of the city, was preparing to make a vigorous desence, when the Florentine party

m Billius, ubi fupra, p. 118.

fummoned a meeting of the presidents and chief citizens, before whom they law all that had passed between them and Palla. Arcolano, brother to Giovanni, was at the head of the Florentine party, and expatiated on the service they would do their country, and the reliance they might have on the gratitude of the Florentine government, who would put the management of the city into the hands of the nobility, if they would immediately dispatch Justus, and admit the Florentine commissaries, who were lying with an army before

This meeting was to secretly held, that Justus knew nothing of it; and the company agreeing to Arcolano's propolal, their gates. . . .

Tustus of Volterra murdered.

he and some of his friends repaired to the palace, and drawing him into a private room, under pretence of business, they murdered him, after making a brave refistance, and desperately wounding two of the affaifins. His death stunned his pany fo much, that Arcolano and his friends found no difficulty in opening their gates to the Florentine, who immediately repossessed themselves of Valterran. But the Valterrans were miscrably deceived in their expectations; for the Florentines, Misery of now both hating and despising them, obliged them to pay the the Volter- cataste to the rigour. Their nobility were treated in the same manner as their plebeians, their territory was dismembered from their city, and their few remaining privileges were abolished.

Rise of the ี ขบณฑ against Lucca.

rans.

AMONGST the other officers employed by the Florentines in Florentine their war was Nicolo, nephew by the fifter to Brachio, whole name he assumed, and is therefore distinguished by the title of Fortebrachie. He had served in Lemburdy; and upon the conclusion of the peace, between Florence and the duke of Milan, he was so far from disbanding the troops he commanded, that he increased them, under pretence of afferting some family-rights in the dutchy of Spoleto, of which he was a native . He was, however, again employed by the Florentine commissaries in the reduction of Volterra; and when that was completed, it was supposed, according to Machiavel?, that Rinaldo de Albizi persuaded him to make an inroad into the Lucquese, out of the hatred he bore to Paola Guinigi.

Death and FLORENCE by this time had lost her noble and faithcharacter sul patriot John de Medici, who bequeathed to his eldest son of John de Cosmo an immense estate, and a double portion of his own Medici. spirit, patriotism, and moderation. The advice he gave his family upon his death-bed is full of the noblest a sentiments licy, as well as justice, pleaded for peace. They could expect no affistance from the Venetians, who were busied in settling their new acquisitions; and that the duke of Milan, pleased with seeing them engaged in a fresh war, which would finish the ruin of their snances, would either openly or secretly affist Lucca, which was so much his interest to keep them from possessing. Upon the whole, he concluded that the best conduct they could observe would be to remain quiet; in which case, it was more than probable, the Lucquese, tired of their tyrant, would put themselves under the protection of Florence; and he concluded by prophesying, that, by pursuing the war, they would precipitate their own ruin.

MACHIAVEL, ubi fupra. ◆ Machiavel, ubi fupra.

[•] ARETIN, pag. 262. 4 Id. ibid.

THERE was so much weight and justice in Uzano's reason-War reing, that the advocates for war had nothing to reply, but to solved one call for a division, which gave the question in their savour by a majority of sour hundred against ninety-eight. The ten sield-deputies for the management of the war were then nominated; and two generals, Astorre Gianni and Rinaldo Albizi, were appointed to command the troops; but it was likewise agreed, that Fortebrachio should be taken into their service, and keep possession of the towns he had reduced. This proved to be a capital oversight, as neither of their generals were soldiers; and Fortebrachio was secretly distaissed, in not having the sole command. The expedition however was so popular, that they soon raised an army of about two thousand, besides the troops which served under Fortebrachio.

GUINIGI, feeing the florm ready to break upon him, The Lucfilled all Italy and the greatest part of Christendom with invec- quese aptives against the Florentine breach of faith; but he chiefly ap-ply to their pealed to the pope, the duke of Milan, and the Venetians, for allies. the justice of his cause. Philip was the only power who gave ear to his complaints. Billius, who was a noble and learned Milanese, and wrote at that time, tells us a, that Philip was the principal instrument of the war, and that he himself had seen at Sienna letters from that duke to the Florentines, promising them his affistance, which he did only with a view of sometting a war that might weaken both parties.

The incapacity of the Florentine generals to command an army foon appeared. Leaving Florence, they divided their army, Afterre taking the command of one part, and Rinaldo of the other. Afterre marched with his division towards Camegiere and Pietrafanta; while Rinaldo kept the heights with his. They proceeded, wherever they came, not only impoli-tically, but brutally. Afterre arriving at Seravezza, or Saludeila Serva, a fine rich populous vale in the neighbourhood or Pietrafanta, the inhabitants, who being Guelphs, had long disliked Guinigi's government, offered to submit to that of Florence. Afterre pretending to receive their submissions, ordered the inhabitants to assemble in the great church, where, surrounding them with his troops, he told them they were his prisoners. He then let loose his soldiers, who plundered their lands, violated their wives and daughters, and were guilty of the most horrible outrages in their country, not even sparing their churches. Some of the Seravezza, however, found means, though with difficulty, to escape to Flarence, where they represented their case in so moving a many ner, that the Florentines recalled Afterre, condemned and admonished him.

^{*} Billius, ubi fupra, pag. 125.

RINALDO DE ALBIZI fell under the public suspicion at the same time; for the Florentines observed, that though he had been the principal patron of the war, he had been fe remiss in pursuing it, that he seemed to mind nothing but enriching himself at the expence of the defenceless or conquered Lucquese. This coming to the ears of Rinaldo, whose impetuosity and pride were boundless, he came without leave to Florence, where he presented himself before the ten deputy ties, and with bitter upbraidings of their and his country's ingratitude, he refigned his commission. The council of ten did not venture to punish a man of his eminence; but gave the command of their army to Neri di Gino, Caponis fon, and Alamanno Salviati, who made dispositions for acting with vigour against the enemy. Guinigi all this while was not wanting to himfelf. Being master of great sums of money, he raised troops in all quarters, and applied to the Siennese for their assistance, or if that could not be obtained, for their mediation. The Siennese, equally dreading the progress, and detesting, the cruelty of the Florentines, undertook the latter office, and fent Antonio Francisco to mediate a peace between them and the Lucquese. But the former were now so bent upon the conquest of Lucca, that his negotiation came to nothing, and the Siennese applied to the Venetians for their good offices. Their answer was, that they knew nothing of the Siennese, farther than that they had been included in the. late peace; and they returned to Sienna without effecting any thing. Upon this Antonio Francisco, who was a young nobleman of great spirit and interest, lest Sienna; and, in conjunction with one of Guinigi's nephews, raised a large body of troops, who threw themselves into Lucca. Amongst others they paid thirty thousand ducats by way of advance money to Raineris

The Lucquese pre pare for war.

Raintrio of Perugia, who, having received the sum, betrayed them and went over to the Fiorentines, who, by the like sum, as is said, engaged him and three hundred horse in their service.

Though this defection greatly incommoded Guinigib, yet Lucca behe now found himself in a condition to make a vigorous de-feged, fence. For this purpose, he hired of the Spaniards six gallies, and many smaller vessels for disappointing all the efforts of his enemies by water. The new Florentine generals, on the other hand, changing the plan of operations laid down by their predecessors, advanced to Campanole a ainst Lucca; and their army, being now greatly encreased, they surrounded it, but without forming a regular siege; and burned or ravaged all the country round.

Many of the Italian historians mention the Florentines as being severe and rapacious masters of their acquired dominions, and perhaps they are not the only republicans who are charged in history on the same account. It is certain, that their behaviour to the Pilans and Volterrans gave the Lucquese a greater abhorrence of their government than they entertained for that of their tyrant, as they and the other Italian republics affected to call Guinigi. The ravages committed in their territories were far from allaying this spirit in the Lucquese, and they promised to hold out against their enemics to the last extremity. Guinigi had two fons; the eldest; Pendelfo, was legitimate, the other natural; but, like the rest of the Italian princes of those days, he made little or no diflinction on that account. To the former he committed the care of defending the city, and to the other, the conduct of the fallies, which were frequent and generally successful. The Florentines were provided with a kind of attillery, which, by the force of gunpowder, discharged large stones; but the Lucquese, perceiving that they did very little execution, came Introducat last to despise them, and every day renewed their fallies, tion of to the great flaughter of their enemies, by the help of mus. I mall firequets, or fmall fire arms, to which the Florentines were stran-urms gers, and which, before this siege, were not known in Italy, though perhaps they were in other parts of Europe. reader, in the notes, will find a curious and a natural description from Billius (A) of those dreadful implements of war,

b Billius ubi supra, p. 126.

(A) Preter jacula, & sagitta- sustem cubili, & alterius dimilli rum balistas, novum quoque teli ge- longion; buic sustixio reant canna nus invenerunt: gerebant manihus serres, qvibns item suspliure, ac war, which are now become so common, and of the execution they did upon the Florentines. It was such as encouraged the besieged to redouble their fallies upon the besiegers, whose army was divided into two camps; from both of which they were driven by the belieged, and one of the Florentine generals narrowly missed being made a prisoner. He was rescued by Cardano, one of the chief officers; but the besieged carried off with them four great guns (cannon we suppose are meant) called by our author bombarde: a great number of prisoners were likewise made.

The Florentines baffled in

THE issue of that day at last convinced the Florentines, that it was impossible for them to master the city in the manner the fiege was carried on. The bitter weather was now the fiege of approaching; and neither the Florentine generals, nor the of Lucca. field-deputies, could prevail with the foldiers to leave the villages in the neighbourhood, and to encamp fo near the walls as to block up the city. Philip Bruneleschi, who is so famous for reviving in Europe the true principles of architecture, and erecting in Florence edifices that, to this day, are master-pieces in that art, was then in the Florentine camp; and he gave it as his opinion, in which he was joined by the general officers, that it was possible to turn the course of the river Serchio, so as to drown Lucca. As he was looked upon to be the best engineer of that age, his proposal, however romantic it appeared, might have proved successful, could the Florentine army have been prevailed upon to encamp new enough to the city, to have interrupted the dispositions made by the belieged, for defeating Bruneleschi's plan, which was to have turned the course of the Serchio, by means of a strong mound, = so as by the lateral pressure of its waters, to have borne down the walls, or by their rifing to have overflowed them. The Lucquese perceived his design, and raised a mound parallel to his, between their walls and the diverted course of the river, which served as a bulwark to the city, and when the water | were raised to a proper height between the two mounds, the belieged, dividing their forces, fent one part in the night-time a to attack that part of the Florentine camp that lay nearest the mound, and armed the other part with all kinds of infirm ments for digging and boring, by which they broke down and pierced the Florentine mound, so as to overflow all the > nitro oppletis, globulor ferreos vi quin sæpe duos aut & tertium, iguis emittebant. Certa erat in fi per ordinem occurrerent, una ictu, fi tetigisset, pernicies; nec glande transfoderent (1). arma, aut scuta satis tegebant, is on which the beliegers were encamped, which it impracticable again to approach the city on that

⁽¹⁾ Billius, ubi supra, pag. 127.

E Florentine field-deputies, and their magistracy, vexed Unpopula-Joffes and difgraces they had received in the course of rity of ge, sent Giovanni Guicciardini to take upon him the Guinigi. mmand, and his authority prevailed with the foldiers amp nearer the town. It is probable, that this new I would not have been more successful than his predehad been, could Guinigi's treasures have held out. But, as they were, they were now exhausted, and he was I to use some unseasonable severities upon the citizens e more; upon which a conspiracy was formed against ithin the walls. Guinigi was not insensible of his own : and, by the advice of Antonio of Sienna, who had neredibly active for the Lucquese, he sent Silvestro Trenta ngi Benvisi (B) to Milan, to implore that duke's assis-

Those ambassadors were of the number of the conrs against him; and indeed the noble desence the Lucnade, was not owing to any affection they had for Guiut to the aversion they had to the Florentines. E latter had all along been distrustful of Philip's con- The Lucand they had at this very time deputies at his court to quese obit, and to keep him at least firm in his neutrality. tain affianswered both them and the Lucquese only in general the duke of and feemed unwilling to take any concern in the fate Milan. ca. Upon this the Lucquese deputies applied privately

i; and laying before him the state of the siege and city, they told him, that rather than it should fall into nds of the Florentines, if he would support them with per force, the citizens would depose Guinigi, and put elves under his (Philip's) protection. Even this enement did not drive Philip from his usual caution. He I to declare himself on either side; but he managed a fo, that Sforza, who then commanded his troops, and 1 his own pay a confiderable body, should publicly dehis leave to march upon an expedition to Naples. This brained, and Sforza, having settled every thing relating pay, and the number of his troops, both with Philip ie Lucquese, pointed his march directly towards Tas-

g to Billius, the plan of court of Milan.

We have followed Ma- been before concerted with Av-I's account here; but, ac- tonio, who was in diffusion at the His policy.

This management was not so secret as to be concealed from Boccacino Alamanni, the Florentine resident at Milan, who put his principals upon their guard. All they could do was to raise new troops, and to fortify the passes into their country, which proved no obstacle to Sforza. His march, however, was retarded when he came to the foot of the Appennines, by Philip's usual caution, who wanted to see in what light the Venetians would confider his conduct. Perceiving they did not move, he ordered Sforza to proceed.

Sforza raises the fiege of Lucca.

THE Florentines were in hopes of carrying Lucca before his arrival, and pressed the siege with more vigour than ever; but were as vigorously repulsed. At last Sforza, at the head of three thousand veteran troops, forced his way over the Appennines, and, carrying all before him, appeared in fight of the Florentine army, which immediately raised the siege, and retired to an advantageous camp at Librafratta, lying at an equal distance between Pifa and Lucca. Sforza upon this demolished all the works that had been raised by the besiegers, and entered Lucca in triumph, where he was received as their deliverer and guardian, by Guinigi and the inhab tants; and, at Antonio's request, the arrears due to Sforza were paid, tho' it drained Guinigi of the small remainder of his money. A council of war being held, it was resolved to act upon the defensive, and Sforza marched with his army towards Piftoia, where he took and demolished Bugiano, a fortified town, and then laid fiege to Pescia, a town of the greatest importance to the safety of Florence itself. Pagolo Diacetto, governor of the place, abandoned it and fled to Piftoia.

Di/mal Florentines,

In is certain, that the affairs of the Florentines were at flate of the this time a melancholy aspect. Their ill success in the field had encreased the people's animosities against their magistrates. Their generals were without military talents, and divided amongst themselves. They were hated by many, not only of the neighbouring states, but of their own dependencies; and they had not an ally whom they could trust. Their public money was exhausted; and nothing but the feeble interpolition of Pescia could keep Sfor za from marching to the, gates of Florence. Their dangers, however, existed rather in appearance than in reality. Sforza's secret instructions did not authorize him to act offensively against the Florentines, after the fiege of Lucca was raised; and he had undertaken the expedition against Pescia only for the sake of plunder, and because he knew he could raise no more money at Lucia. The Florentines knew all this; and while Malevolte, who was ext in command to the governor, held out Pescia, the siege ll of a sudden was relaxed, and then finally railed. Machiad himself does not deny that this happened through the prealence of money proffered by the Florentines to Sforza; for rough the republic of Florence was then poor, many of its rivate citizens were immensely rich. The Florentines, who ere in the fecret negociation, were so confident of the ower of money upon a mercenary general, that they were in opes to prevail upon Sforza, not only to raise the siege of 'escia, but to deliver into their hands Lucca itself. Sforza who bay of eing a man of honour in his profession, excused himself Sforza. om the latter part of the bargain, but accepted of fifty thound crowns for raising the siege of Pefcia, promising to with-'aw his protection from Lucca while it was governed by Guigi, and to join in any measures that might be taken for desting him. The bargain was actually struck, and Sforze racuated the Florentine territories; and returning to the Lucuse, he encamped without that city (A).

THE Florentines, by their agreement with Sforza, were at verty to practife every art against the Lucquese; and they ade use of some that, perhaps, were unwarrantable. Anto and proof Sienna was then in the city; and the Florentines em. cure the denyed crafty agents to carry letters in their names, some of position em directed to Guinigi, and others to the chief citizens to were distatisfied with his government. The agents caring letters to the citizens fuffered themselves to be interoted by Guinigi, and the letters directed to Guinigi were fered to fall into the hands of the citizens. By the conits of the former, the citizens were rendered suspected to n; and in the letters directed to him, the Florentines wrote a firmin which implied that a treaty was far advanced becen him and them; and that he was to put the city into eir hands, upon their paying him two hundred thousand owns: mention was likewife made, in several of the letters tercepted by the citizens, as if Guinigi had agreed to put stonio to death; and those being shewn to Antonio, made m resolve upon the destruction of Guinigi.

So complicated a scene of deceit must have been ineffecal, could Guinigi and the citizens have come to an expla-

my unsatisfactory, and leaves contemporary authors. mentirely in the dark as to the

(A) The account given by motives and fprings of the re-dechievel of the important volution which took place. We basistion that followed Sfor- are, therefore, obliged to supwe return to the Lucquese is ply it from Billius, and other nation; but they were too distrustful of one another for that to take place; and thus each secretly meditated the ruin of and impri- the other. The event was, that Antonio and about forty. fonment of other citizens surprized Guinigi in the night-time in the cita-Guinigi. del, where he thought himself secure; and, after upbraiding him with his government, deprived him of the keys of the castle, and put him under arrest, as Sforza did his son Pandolfo, who was in his camp. Both of them were fent prisoners to Milan, where they died under their confinement.

Mod. HIST. Vol. XXXVI.

The Gemoese declare against the Florentines.

IT must be acknowledged, that notwithstanding all the various arts the Florentines had employed against the Lucques, they failed in their design, which was that of reducing them to subjection. It is plain, that they had been outwitted by Sforza; and yet they could not complain of his having deceived them. According to some authors, he received thirtyfive thousand crowns more from the Florentines, with a promise of fifteen thousand besides, at the expiration of three months, if he and his troops remained inactive during that time. He accordingly drew off his army to Mirandola, and lest the desence of the Lucquese to themselves; to which, in their reduced condition, they were very unequal. They were fo fensible of their weakness, that they sent public letters to the Florentines, that they were now free from their tyrantwhom the Florentines had made their pretext for the war; that they were willing to yield to the Florentines some marks of superiority, provided they were left to the full enjoyment of their own laws and liberties. The Florentines, being now delivered from the fear of Sforza, rejected this equitable offer, on pretence that the complexion of the war was altered from what it was originally; and that it had cost them so much blood and treasure, that they would be contented with nothing less than the entire subjection of the Lucquese. infamous condition was rejected, and the Lucquese prepared to defend themselves to the last extremity, as the Florentines did to renew the fiege. Antonio of Sienna, knowing that his country would fall the next facrifice to the Florentines, should they become masters of Lucca, went on board a vessel to Genoa, which was then governed by the archbishop of Milan for Philip; tho', in other respects, the Genoese still were in full pollession of their laws and properties; and a vast number of them were immensely rich. These he addressed for affiltance against the Florentines, against whose ambition and injustice he bitterly inveighed; but without pretending to engage the duke of Milan in the quarrel. The preservation of Lucca from falling into the hands of the Florentines, was of the utmost consequence to the Genoese, who promised Antonio, that if the duke of Milan would give them leave they would affift the Lucquese with their good offices; and if those should fail, with their arms. This favourable answer was owing to their hopes of recovering Leghorn from the Florentines, who had bought it from Fulgolo. They fent a deputation to Florence, in terms which offended the Florentines; for they not only required them to defift from their war with Lucca, but inlisted upon the restitution of Leghorn. Their answer was equally disagreeable to the Genoese, whom they said they could not consider as a free people, but as subjects to the duke of Milan; and that therefore they could not treat with them as an independent state. Upon which the Genoese deputies, in great rage, mounted their horses and lest Florence. their return to Genoa, and reporting the success of their commission, the Genoese came immediately to a resolution of declaring war against the Florentines, and of employing Nicolo Picinine for their general; all which they did with the approbation and connivance of the duke of Milan.

THE Florentines had intelligence of this new storm that Disfimulathreatened them, and took into their pay a body of fourteen tion of bundred horse belonging to Guido of Faenza, appointing, at Philip. the same time, the count of Urbino to be general of this army, though he was very unequal to that command. Florentine deputies at Venice did not fail to represent to that fenate, that the duke of Milan was at the bottom of all that management, and how dangerous it would be to their state if he should obtain the sovereignty of Tuscany, which he aimed at. The Venetians upon this complained to Philip, who, with his usual dissimulation, told them that he had lent the Genoese a body of troops; that it was the same thing to him whether they affisted the Lucquese or the Florentines, for he was fensible they aimed at nothing but to defend them-Elves. To confirm what he said, he sent the Venetians 2 copy of his convention with the Genoese, by which he left them at entire liberty to join with whom they pleased. The Venetians appeared, or seemed to appear, fatisfied with this answer, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the Florentines.

By this time Picinino, who had taken the command of the Progress of Gmosse army, marched to relieve Lucca, again belieged by the war. the Florentines, who, upon his approach, abandoned the siege, and entrenched themselves on the banks of the Serchio. Their army was computed to be five thousand horse and three thousand foot, all hired troops, and ten thousand Florentines; a proof of the intrinsic riches of the subjects of that state, notwithstanding the vast expences and losses they had R 2 sustained.

clamation that all Pisans, between fifteen and fixty, should immediately leave the city. Being of a brutal nature, he himself was the executioner of this order; but retained the wives and children of the unhappy Pilans as pledges for their conduct. Notwithstanding this precaution, a plot was formed within the city for delivering the same up to Picinino, who daily presented himself before its gates; and the design was discovered, but by great accident 2. Picinino, however, conquered all the Volterran territory; and Volterra itself would have submitted to him, had he not been attended by a great number of the Volterran exiles, who were irreconcileably obnoxious to the governing party in the city.

Policy of Milan.

WHILE the triple league between Philip, the Genoese, the duke of and the Siennese, was depending, some of the young Siennese, without either authority or leader, made an irruption into the Florentine territory, where they burned down a castle. The news of this rash action arrived at Milan, while Philip was in conference with the deputies of the two republics, and in great perplexity, whether he should conclude the league or not. The adventure was no sooner related to him, than with joy in his countenance he ordered all that the Siennese deputies had requested to be granted them b; a circumstance that well expresses his cautious character. Accordingly count Alberigo was ordered to put himself at the head of two thousand horse to join Picining, that the Tuscan war might be carried on with decifive vigeur. It foon appeared that the Florentine subjects had no aversion to put themselves under the protection of Philip, though they refused to submit to the Siennese; for the war being now carried on in Philip's name, many forts and castles readily submitted to his general. Picinino then marched to the valley of Alfa, the most beautiful and populous of any in Italy; and he was preparing to reduce Staggio, and the neighbouring forts, most of which belonged to private subjects of Florence, when he was encouraged to hope that he might easily make himself master of Arezzo, by means of a conspiracy within that city. It is said, not without great colour of truth, that the Florentines themselves were at the bottom of this suggestion, that they might draw him out of that country. It is certain, that Picining was so intent on the conquest of Arezzo, that he burned all the preparations he had made for his other expedition, and marched directly to that city, the people, wherever he pailed, presenting him with the keys of their towns and cal-

b BIL-

² Machiavel, book iv. Billius, pag. 148. L!Us, ubi supra.

tles (B). When he came before Arezzo, he found he had been imposed on, and that no dispositions were made for giving up the city. Having waited for some days without any effect, the Siennele, and the other troops, pressed him to begin the fiege, protesting that he would not return alive if they did not take it in four days. While Picinine was deliberating on this proposal, matters took an unexpected turn in Lombardy, and Philip sent an order for Picinine to return to Milan. So dreadful was Picinino's name in Tuscany, that the Florentines confidered his departure, though he was attended by no troops, and though Alberigo succeeded to his command, as a deliverance. They chose for their general Michaletto, who had been bred up under Sforza; and so greatly were they encouraged by Picinino's departure, that he foon had the face of an army. The first gleam of good fortune they obtained was an advantage they gained over Alberigo at Colle, where, against his own inclination, he was obliged to fight the Florentines, and was worsted. This advantage, though but trifling, was celebrated at Florence with an extravagance of joy.

WE are to reflect, that all the Florentine dominions were Losses of at this time reduced to Florence, their great walled towns the Floand cities, and a few inconsiderable places that had been rentines. Spared in the vale of Alfa. Almost all their open country had been reduced by Picinino and the Siennese; but the late defeat of Alberigo gave a turn to their fortune. Philip, fulpecting him to have an understanding with the Florentines. sent for him in chains to Milan, his command devolving on the young Antonio of Pergola, who neither had any authority in the army, nor any opportunities of giving a proof of his military capacity, as the leafon was too far advanced for action. After this, during the winter, not a day passed without some notable desection from the Milanese army, and many of their best troops and officers went into the Florentine:

Crvice.

By this time the Venetians, alarmed at Philip's vast progress in Tuscany, had concluded a new league with the Florentines, and had fitted out a greater naval armament than

(B) The reader is not to imaine that the castles, forts, and fortified towns he meets with fo Often in this history, were, for the most part, any other than the houses of private gentlemen, or open villages, with a few works of defence, cast up about them to secure them from being furprifed by the banditti, and disbanded soldiery, which, at this time, and long before, had infested Italy, and which always followed the fortune of the field.

had for many ages been known in Italy. It was to oppose them that he had recalled Picinino out of Tuscany, and given him the command of both his sea and land forces. The Venetian sleet having sailed up the Po, being most or all of them gallies, and drawing very little water, lay opposite to their land army, which was commanded by Carmignola, against whom Picinino alone could make head, as their sleet was by Stefano of Treviso. This encampment was near Cremona; while the Milanese sleet, which was equal in number, but say above that city. Picinino seemed intent only upon the land operations; but all of a sudden, without communicating his design to any one but Sforza, perceiving Carmignela's attions of the Milanese galley, and though unused to that service by his

The Venetians defeated by water. design to any one but Sforza, perceiving Carmignela's attention fixed upon the army, he threw himself on boards' Milanese galley, and, though unused to that service, by his own personal valour and intrepidity, he gave the Venetians one of the greatest deseats they had ever received on the water, while Carmignela could do nothing but deplore it from the shore. The particulars of this deseat, and of the vast booty made by the Milanese and Genoese, are foreign to this part of our history; but it is said, that the equipment of the whole cost the Venetians six hundred thousand ducats.

To compensate this loss the Venetians, having sent round fome gallies towards the gulph of Genoa, deseated the Genoality gallies in the Tuscan sea; and the Florentines, under Michaletto, surprised Trebia, and reduced most of the places that had been taken during the summer by Picinino and the Simple, who were now thrown into the utmost despondency; but a pestilential distemper breaking out amongst their horse in the field, both parties were obliged to go into quarters. We are to take this interval to resume the domestic affairs of Florence.

Discentents at Flosence.

. . . .

THE bad success of the war against Luccea rendered it from being a very popular a most unpopular measure. They who had been the most forward in carrying it on, now shifted the blame upon one another; but the weight of the public indigination fell upon the leaders. Guicciardini, who had commanded in chief after Sforza's retreat, was accused of having received money from the enemies of Florence; and the spirit against him ran so high, that the gonfalonier cited him take his trial; but either Guicciardini's interest in the state, or his innocence of the charge, prevented the matter from going farther. The charge against Cosmo de Medici had most serious consequences.

THIS nobleman, by his behaviour in the state, had shewn the Florentines what they could not otherwise have believed.

for the second and that it was possible his father could be excelled in all the duties History of of an able difinterested citizen. The first maxim Cosmo laid down the exile of in life was, to fide with no party in the republic; but by hi ad-Cosmo de vice, his hospitality, munificence, and other virtues, to oblige Medici. the individuals of all. He carried this maxim so far, that when he found public business could not go on, without the fanction of his credit, he always prevailed with his friend Puccio Pucci to take the lead in the management of affairs: and his party went by Puccio's name. His other friend was Averardo di Medici, an excellent soldier; but so cautious was Cosmo in party-matters, that, though he highly approved of the war with Lucca, yet he employed his interest in giving the command of it to those who were known to be no friends to his family. We shall not here enter into the dispute, whether this was not carrying the principles of difinierestedness to an impolitic length. Cosmo's friends, not so difinterested as he was, laid hold of all opportunities to aggravate the losses of the state, and vilify the conduct of its generals, which was of no service to him; for, notwithstanding all his modesty and self-denial, he was still looked upon as the principal citizen of Florence; and the enemies of his family considered every thing as being done by his secret concurrence and approbation. Nicolo de Uzano was still respected for his great integrity, abilities, and experience, and was thought the only person capable to counterpoize Cosmo's interest in the flate. Barbadori, so called from the yellow beards of his family, was fent by Rinaldo Albizi, and the other enemies of the Medici, to persuade Uzano to head the party against Cosmo. The venerable patriot, in his answer, wished that his beard had been filver instead of gold, for he then might have resected on the consequences of what he proposed. He then entered into a detail of the divisions and factions that prevailed amongst the families who called themselves noble, and proved that Cosmo's party had as good a right to that appellation as that of his antagonists. He next proceeded to a defence of Cosmo, and shewed the injustice of persecuting a man merely because he had acquired popularity by virtue. After this he remonstrated upon the folly of such an attempt, on account of Cosmo's prodigious influence in the state; and put Barbadori in mind, that, supposing Cosmo to be ruined, they must be governed by Rinaldo, who was a much worse man. In the conclusion of his discourse, which is fully recited by Machiavel c, he advised them to concord and moderation, as being the only terms on which the state could be served.

Rancour mies.

Those fentiments, so worthy of a patriot and a wife of bis ene- man, made such an impression upon Cosmo's enemies, that every thing remained quiet during the war with Lucca. But at the end of that, Uzano dying, Rinaldo became the head of the party; and being the irreconcileable furious enemy of Medici, he left nothing undone to dispose his countrymen to a civil war, rather than not ruin his antagonist. He persuaded all his party never to appear in public but in arms, that the people might be more impressed with an apprehension of danger; and all their civil meetings, even for the choice of magistrates, wore a military aspect, and were seldom closed without tumults (C).

RINALDO's success in this was such that he now only wanted a gonfalonier to his mind. The person most likely to answer his purpose was Bernardo Guadagno, whose debts he paid off, lest the greatness of them might have obstructed his election, which went in his favour. Scarcely had he entered his office, when Rinaldo laid before him the danger of Cosmo's popularity, which, without charging him with any other crime, he faid had deprived the republic of her liberty. To encourage Bernardo to proceed, he brought many instances in which popularity had deserted the impeached when they came to a trial, and that Cosmo would find himself in the same condition, especially as he and his friends were resolved to support to the last extremity the administration of justice.

His danger.

BERNARDO was easily persuaded to do as Rinaldo defired him. After some consultation with the other magistrates, Cosmo was summoned to the palace, where he was put under arrest; and the senate assembling, the people created a Balia of two hundred, for the reformation of the state, and the trial of Cosmo; while Rinaldo, and his friends, appeared in arms in the piazza where the Balia were fitting. The debates concerning Cosmo lasted sour days, during which time he was confined to a strong room called the Alberghettino, from whence he had an opportunity of hearing and feeing the buftle that was made concerning his life, death, or banishment. This filled him with apprehensions lest his enemies should take him off by poison; and for sour days

(C) Netwithstanding all this, Machiavel gives this Rinaldo a great character, and calls him a man worthy of honour in all fortunes. If we confider what afterwards happened, when the house of Medici came to be so. vereigns of Florence, there are reasons for believing that Rinaldo had motives for his conduct, which have not been explained by Machiavel.

he eat only a little bread. His keeper's name was Malavolti, who, observing Cosmo's distrust, considered it as a restection upon his own honour, and declared that no foul dealings should be offered to him while in his custody; and, to prove his fincerity, he ordered victuals to be brought, of which he tafted before his face. This generous behaviour filled the prisoner's eyes with tears of gratitude; and he won so far upon his keeper, that, being now redisposed to the comforts of fociety, Malavelti introduced to his company one Fargannacio, a man of wit and humour, and intimately acquainted with the gonfalonier. Cosmo knew that money at that time went a great way in Floreuce; and, after supper, Malavolti having prudently withdrawn, Colmo, after a most obliging address, gave Fargannacio a private token to receive, on his account, one thousand one hundred ducats at the hospital of Santa Maria Nuova; one hundred of which he allotted to Fargannacio himself, and the other thousand was to be paid to the gonfalonier. This well-timed bribe, or bounty, by fof- and fentening the gonfalonier, mollified Cosmo's fate, and his sen-tence. tence was, that he should be sent in exile to Padua. Many of his relations, together with Puccio Pucci, were banished at the fame time; and dispositions were made for keeping in awe those who were diffatisfied with their sentences.

COSMO received his doom, which was pronounced on the third of October, 1433, with a chearful countenance, and perfect refignation to the will of his judges, only befeeching them to grant him protection against his enemies, who he understood waited in the piazza to murder him. The gonfalonier undertook that office; and, after attending him in the palace till supper was over, he gave him a strong guard, which accompanied him out to the confines of the Florentine territories to those of Venice, where he was received with the highest honours.

A. D. 1433.

RINALDO, and Cosmo's other enemies, considered his Disage. banishment as a triumph over themselves, and the forerunner pointment of their destruction. Rinaldo, in despair, summoned together of Rihis party, and, after remonstrating upon the folly and mad-naldo, ness of suffering Cosmo to escape with life, he proposed that the nobles should seize by force the government, restore the exiled nobility of their own party, and deprive the plebeians of all their power in the state. He supported his opinion with many specious arguments; but was opposed by Mariotto Boldavinetti, who thought the tyranny of the plebeians to be more tolerable than that of the nobles, who were arrived at the highest pitch of pride and insolence. Mariotto's opinion prevailed; and Rinaldo attributed his counsel being rejected to a judicial infatuation. It being now anparent that Rinaldo's party was divided, Cosmo's friends began to bestir themselves, and a letter to him from Agnoto Accion voli was intercepted. Its contents informed him of the good disposition of the city in his favour, and advised him by all means to make Neri Geni his friend, and that the state was in fuch diffress for money as must occasion his sudden recal. This letter being laid before the magistracy, occasioned Acnoloto to be banished; but his punishment was so far from damping Cosmo's friends, that they daily encreased; and when new magistrates were chosen in 1434, Nicholas de Cocco was made gonfalonier, and eight senators were elected, all of them devoted to Cosmo. Rinaldo, upon this, again summoned his party, to shew them their impending danger, and proposed that they should take arms, continue Donato Veluti, who was then gonfalonier, in his office, and proceed immediately to a new election of magistrates, by burning the old purses which contained the names of the magistrates, and making a new imborsation.

lel

'A. D.

1434.

WHILE many of the affembly were inclined to follow this advice, it was opposed by Palla Strozzi, a nobleman of great temper and moderation, who thought that they ought by no means to take arms, till they were obliged by the near approach of a foreign enemy, when they might do it without alarming the people, or bringing themselves into danger. After farther deliberation it was agreed, that the new magistrates should enter upon the exercise of their offices; but that if they should attempt any thing against the nobility, the latter should affemble at St. Pulinare, and proceed as circumstances should occur. The first act of authority the new gonfalonier performed, was the imprisoning his predecessor Donato Veluti for embezzling the public money. He then called a meeting of the friends of the house of Medici, whom he found so powerful, that he cited Rinaldo, Ridolfo Peruzzi, who takes and Nicolo Barbadori, to appear before him. Rinaldo, instead of submitting, flew to arms; and the rest of his party, according to agreement, allembled at St. Pulinare, and they were joined by a great number of dishanded soldiers, who happened at that time to be in Florence; so that the palace was beset.

arms,

RINALDO, however, could not support himself and his party against the appearance of legal authority. Two of the greatest men of his party, Palla Strozzi and Giovanni Guicciardini, refused to join him in arms. Palla came to Pulenare on horseback, attended by only two footmen, and was there received by most bitter upbraidings from Rinaldo, who reproached proached him with folly, cowardice, and treachery; first in faving Cosmo's life; secondly, in slighting his (Rinaldo's) counfels; and thirdly, in refuling to join him in arms. To this Palla made no reply but by turning the head of his horse, and retreating as fast as he could. As to Guicciardini, he excused his appearance, on pretence that his presence was neteffary at home, to keep his brother from joining the opposite party. But Rinaldo's greatest disappointment consisted in the general backwardness of his party to join him; and while he was waiting for the troops he expected, the magistrates recovered from their consternation, thut the palace gates, and prepared for a vigorous defence.

THIS was no fooner known than the Medici party ap-but fails of peared in their turn, as the champions of legal government. Juccess. Rinaldo however was so powerful, and his pretexts so specious, that the magistrates thought proper to enter into treaty with him. They fent some of their own body to assure him, that they had no thoughts of recalling Cosmo from his banishment: and that he was welcome to enter the palace, and receive fatisfaction as to all his just complaints. Rinaldo refused to trust himself in their hands, and publicly declared his resolution of reforming the state, and reducing the magistrates to the rank of private men. Ridolfo Peruzzi was not fo tractable. He thought that the offer made by the senate was fair and equitable, and declared that all he fought was to prevent Cosmo's return, and that he was willing to obey the magistrates. He accordingly repaired to the palace, where he and all his friends were cordially received. The defection of so great a man threw an irrecoverable damp upon Rinaldo's party.

POPE Eugene IV. happened at this time to be at Florence, He is bawhere he had taken refuge after he had been expelled from nifbed. Rome. He offered himself as a mediator to reconcile the contending factions; and the magistrates of Florence, that they might come the more easily to their purpose, seemed to accept his mediation; but in terms so vague and indetermined, that it gave him no power to conclude any thing in their name. Eugene, however, fent the patriarch Giovanni Vitelleschi, one of Rinaldo's friends, to treat with him; and Rinaldo, at his persuasion, went to Santa Maria Novella, where the pope refided. After some discourse Rinaldo, finding how little he could depend upon his party, confented to by down his arms; and his consent was intimated to Barbadri, and his other friends, who waited without, and who, by the pope's persuasion, did the same. The saction being thus disarmed, proceeded in what they had resolved upon, Juodiiw without the least regard to the mediation of his holines. They privately fent to Pistoia for troops, which were introduced, in the night-time, into the city, and, after feizing all its posts and avenues, the people were summoned to the great piazza; and a new Balia was appointed, which repealed Cosmo's sentence of banishment, and exiled Rinaldo de Albizi, Rodolfo Peruzzi, Nicolo Barbadori, and Palla Strozzi, with all their friends and dependents; so that there was scarce a town in Italy that did not contain Florentine exiles.

THIS is a remarkable period in the Florentine history; and, however blameable Rinaldo might have been in his proceedings, it is certain that we may from this time date the ruin of the republic and constitution of Florence. Rinaldo bore his fate like a brave man. When the pope condoled with him, and mentioned the treachery, as he called it, of the magiftrates, he reproached himself with weakness in imagining that his holiness, who had himself been driven from Rome. could protect him in Florence: in all other respects, his behaviour was manly and philosophical. While he accused the coldness of his friends, he blamed his own misguided conduct, and Cosmo re-submitted to his sentence. Cosmo, in the mean while, was called from upon his return to Florence, where he was received with more exile. joy than Cicero, under the like circumstances, was received at Rome, and was distinguished by the glorious titles of "the Friend of the People, and the Father of his Country."

THE papal power at this time was formidable every where ror arrives but in Italy; for there it was not only deprest, but despited. in Italy: The Florentines, notwithstanding the distractions of their government, still bore a great sway in the affairs of Italy. The emperor Sigismund, who delighted in the parade of mediations, negociations, and public exhibitions of every kind, had failed in his attempt to reduce the Bohemians, whom the infamous murder of John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, at the council of Constance, had driven into arms. Those two are generally reckoned the first martyrs for the protestant religion; and they imbibed their principles from John Wickliff, an Englishman, parson of Lutterworth, who, though he openly avowed the doctrine of reformation, died quietly in his bed. After the defeat of the imperial army by the Bohemians, Sigifmund undertook a journey into Italy, though he was so poor, that he scarcely could defray the expences of it. The name of emperor, however, was still respectable, if not formidable While a general council was holding at Bafil, he was crowned with what is falfly called the iron crown at Milan; and, indeed, his great dependence, even for the charges of his retinue, was upon that duke. The council at Bafil, in imitation of that of Constance, declared itself superior to the pope, and censured him. The Florentines were neutral; but gave the emperor no encouragement to hope for their friendship in Italy.

FROM Milan he journeyed to Rome; but the Florentines affronted paid so little regard to his authority, that they attacked and by the Flobeat at Topori the escort that had been lent him by the duke rentines. of Milan; and when he came to Lucca, they destroyed all the country round, and pent him up within the city; so that he became contemptible in the eyes even of the Italians. From Lucca it was with difficulty that he removed to Sienna, where he remained for some months; and he then obtained leave from the pope to repair to Rome, where he received the idle honour of being crowned emperor of the Romans.

THE distractions of Italy, and the weakness of the emperor, concurred at this time to advance the temporal power of the papacy to a pitch it never had known before; and even its enemies contributed to its greatness. According to Machiavel 2, Italy then contained two different armies; but both united in the fame view, which was that of plunder; and both, finding no other object, had marked out the church's patrimony as their prey. One of those armies, and the most considerable, had been bred up under Sforza; the other under Brachio. The former was commanded by Sforza's fon, and the latter by Brachio's disciple Picinino, and his nephew Fortebrachio. The princes and states of Italy knew that murder and rapine fublished both armies, yet they durst disablige neither of them; but the Florentines and the duke of Milan had the courage to make peace with each other, by which the Florentines were put into possession of all that their enemies had conquered from them in the Pisan, the Volterran, and the Arezzian terntories, while the Florentines surrendered all the acquisitions they had made in the Lucquese. This peace was of folid advantage to the Florentines, as it restored them to a state of independency both upon the emperor and the pope. The former, during his stay in Italy, had altered his political lystem. He had broken with the duke of Milan, and he was reconciled to the Venetians; and, notwithstanding the contumelies with which the Florentines had treated him, he courted their friendship. They were so far from repaying him the compliment, that, when he earnestly intreated it, they refused to suffer him to enter Fiorence, when he was upon his return to Germany.

^{*} MACHIAVEL, book v.

Progress of When Sigismund left Italy, Sforza and Fortebrachio at once the war in fell upon the dominions of the church; and, both of them Romagna being mercenaries, they had different objects in their view.

Sforza fell upon the marquifate of Ancona, while Picinine attacked Rome. The reader can scarcely believe in what horror the pontifical power was then held in Italy. The Romans no fooner perceived that they were in danger of a war, on the pope's account, than they drove him out of Rome, and he retired to Florence. Here he entered into a treaty with Sforza, to whom he granted the marquifate of Ancona; but so much was his holiness despised by Sforza, that he dated all the leases and grants he made in the marquifate from his own treasury. in spite of St. Peter and St. Paul b. He then compelled the pope to make him the gonfalonier of the church, by which he had all the executive power of government within the papal dominions. Nicholas wifely complied, and obtained his ends, by fetting Sforza and Fortebrachio at variance. The former inlifted himself under the pope's banners; the latter proceeded in making conquests upon the church-patrimony: but all their operations in the main, by a strange fatality, tended to aggrandize the papacy. Sforza grew jealous of fortebrachio; and the Bolognesse, again throwing off their dependence upon the pope, implored the protection of the duke The duke chose pacific measures, and prevailed of Milan. with both parties to come to a truce, which was but shortlived; for Battista de Cannete, making himself master of Belogna, applied to the duke of Milan for protection, while the pope invoked the aid of the Florentines and the Venetians, Both parties furnished the succours required of them. Pianino was the Milanese general; and Guatamelata commanded the armies of Florence and Venice, having under him Nicola Tolentino as his lieutenant-general. A battle was fought next, Imola, in which the Venetians and Florentines were defeated : and Tolentino, being taken, was sent prisoner to Milan, where foon after he died. The duke of Milan, after obtaining the victory, seemed to give over all thoughts of war; and the pope, with his allies, found means to bring Sforza into their, interest, and prevailed with him to accept the command of their armies. He quickly changed the scale of war in favour, of his holiness, who now prevailed over the stubborn Rement and they submitted to a governor appointed by him. brachio, however, remained the irreconcileable enemy of the

The Florentines defeated.

Roman see. He was in possession of Tivoli, Montefiascomi,

The duke of Milan's view was to preserve Fortebrachio, as a useful check upon the pope and his allies: he therefore ordered Picinino to march through the Romagna into Tuscany, which obliged Sforza to raise the siege of Affis, and to advance towards Forli, where Picinino lay, leaving the care of the war in Ancona to his brother Lione, who was intirely defeated by Fortebrachio. Sforza, asraid of being stript of all his possessions, returned to Ancona, and, in his turn, deseated and took prisoner Fortebrachio, who soon after died of his wounds.

This victory, obtained by Sforza, intirely altered the face Progress of of affairs in Italy. All the towns that had been taken from Sforza. the pope by Fortebrachio, reverted to the Holy See; and even the duke of Milan was obliged to have recourse to Nicolo d'Este marquis of Ferrara's mediation, to obtain a peace from his holiness, which was granted him, upon condition of recalling his troops out of Tuscany and the Romagna, and restoring all he had taken from the church. Battista Canneto, no longer able to support himself in Bologna, was now driven out of that city by Bentivoglio, and the pope recovered full possession of it.

THOUGH the Florentines and their ailies were thus success- Alteraful, yet it is certain that the high spirit of liberty, which had tions in diffinguished the commonwealth of Florence, had now sub-Florence fided in that state and city. Tired with perpetual struggles of adverse factions for power, the citizens no longer stuck to their constitution, and this threw into Cosmo de Medici's hands more power than was confishent for the subject of a republic to possess. Severity became necessary to his party; for they had no other means of fafety. New confiscations, confinements, and banishments, every day took place; and even fanguinary measures, unusual amongst the Florentines, were pursued. Bernardo Guadagni, the gonfalonier, who had banished Cosmo, and four citizens of his party, were beheaded. Zanobi Belfratelli, and Cosmo Barbadori, took refuge in the Veretion state; but so great was the respect paid to Cosmo de Medici by all the powers of Italy at this time, that the Venetians fent them home prisoners, and they were put to death. Machiavel c is inclined to think, that the Venetians were guilty of this breach of honour and hospitality, that they might inflame and perpetuate the Florentine factions, as being most conducive to their own fecurity.

MACHIAVEL, ubi fupra.

Proter of the Medici.

FLORENCE, by those examples of severity, seemed to be united; but it was an union not founded on the principles of her constitution. Cosmo, however, endeavoured all he could to heal the wounds of his country, by recalling all exiles who were willing to be reconciled to the state, and who had not fworn to his and his party's destruction. The powerful family of the Alberti, in particular, was restored. Almost all the nobility submitted to be ranked with the other citizens; and the estates of the exiles, who had lately been banished, were fold at public auction. In the choice of magistrates, none were admitted but those who were devoted to the Medicean interest; and those who were appointed to make the alterations, together with the old senate or magistrates, were impowered to create the new. A new criminal court was inflituted of eight persons, and invested with the power of life and death: and so jealous was the government of the Albizi faction, that a public act passed, decreeing, that no repeal of confiscation or banishment should take place, unless thirty-four out of the thirty seven members, of which the senate was composed, should consent. All correspondence with the exiles was at the same time rendered penal; and the ruhor party, according to Machiavel, went so far as to punish not only words and actions, but intimations by figns, if they imgined they tended to favour any of the profcribed. In that no measure of severity or cruelty was wanting to secure the government in power. To make this system the more permanent, new alliances were made between the Florentines, the pope, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan; and no device shat the wit of man could invent was omitted, to give stability to their system.

Revolutions in Naples In the mean while, Joan queen of Naples died. She had nominated for her successor Regnier of Anjon; but Alphanking of Arragon, disputed the succession with him. The pope, pretending that Naples belonged to the Holy See, diclaimed both sovereigns, and sought to govern that kingdot by his own deputy. The Neapolitans were divided among themselves; and the party that opposed Alphanso applied protection to the duke of Milan, who was still master of Gnoa. The Genoese, from the hatred they had towards Alphanand to secure to themselves the gainful commerce of Nashtted out a powerful fleet, which Alphanso engaged of Gaetta; but was totally deseated, and he himself, his to brothers, with the chief officers of his court and army, we taken prisoners, and sent to Milan.

IT was now thought that Philip duke of Milan would make himself master of Italy; and perhaps the Florentines alone

vehited him, by privately suggesting to the Generic how scanvalous it was for a state so powerful as they were, by sea especially, to live under a foreign yoke; and at the same time proming to support them to the utmost, should they attempt to shake it off. It was not long before those arguments had the defired effect. When Alphonio arrived at Milan, he found means to infinuate himfelf into Philip's good graces, and gave him such ideas of the character and ambition of the French. at rendered him the irreconcileable enemy of Regnier. To the amazement of all Europe, he generously restored Alphan b. his brothers, and friends to their liberty, and fent them with great magnificence to Gensa; from whence Alphanfa transported himself to Gaetta, which some of his party had surprifed. The Genoese confidered the deliverance of Alabamie as an infult upon themselves. Though Philip's victory was owing to them, he had not deigned to confult them about the disposal of his royal prisoner. Francisco Spinola, a noble Ge- and Ge. mefe, who had been the chief instrument of subjecting his noa. country to Philip, finding matters quite ripe for a revolt, fought to repair his fault by restoring the independency of On the feast of St. John the Baptist, when Arismino, the Milanese governor, was about to enter upon his post, Spimla, and a few friends, who were in his fecret, iffued from his palace, and proclaimed liberty in the market-place. Genoese were to unanimous in joining them, that Arismino took refuge in the castle; and his predecessor Opicino, in endeavouring to reach the palace, where he had two thousand foldiers, was intercepted by the mob, and torn in pieces. After this the Genoese took the castle, and driving all the Milanele out of Genoa, regained their independency.

RINALDO DE ALBIZI was still in exile, and The diske relided at Milan, where he practifed upon that duke to de-of Milan clare war against the Florentines. He was not without many declares specious arguments to support his solicitation. The inter-against the tourse between the Florentines and the Genoese was so far from Florenbeing a fecret, that, after the latter recovered their liberty, the tines, Florentines not only entered into a new league with them, but Lent a body of troops to their affiftance, and even persuaded the Venetians to do the same. Notwithstanding all those provocations, Philip was very backward in entering into a fresh war, which he saw must be attended with expence and difficalty. Before he broke with the Florentines, he fent Picinino with an army to endeavour to retake Genea; but though he obtained some advantages over the Genoese, he returned unsuccessful. Upon this the duke of Milan declared war against the Florentines, whom he blamed for the defection of Genoa; and Picinino besieged and took Serazana. Pope Eugene was at this time at Florence; but, upon this new war breaking out, he went to Bologna, where he endeavoured to mediate a peace between Philip and the Florentines, in which the Venetians were to be comprehended. Philip would hear of no terms, unless the Florentines would renounce their alliance with the Genoese, which they peremptorily refused to do. Upon this the pope ordered his general Sforza to join the Florentine general Neri de Gino, and to make head against Picinino, who was then at Lucca with a design to reduce Pisa, though he gave out that he was about to march to Naples, to affift the king of Arragon. The two armies, that under Sforza and Neri de Gino, and that under Picinino, were pretty equal as to numbers, and in all other respects; but it was December before they took the field, and each knew the other's strength fo well, that both of them lay for some time upon the defensive. At last, Picinino made a movement; but failed in his attempt upon Vico Pisano, though he took S. Maria in Castello, and Filletto, and burned S. Giovanni-ulla-Vena, destroying at the fame time the neighbouring country. THE Florentines under Sforza and Gino remained all this

S 2

bas

aubo remain inac- while inactive out of complaisance to the pope, who mediated tive.

> and laid fiege to Borgo, which lay in the Arezzian territory. This attempt drove the Florentines from their neutrality; and Sforza not only raised the siege of Borgo, but totally deseated Picinino, and fell into the Lucquese territories, with an intent to besiege Lucca. In the mean while, the Venetians being called upon by the Florentines, in consequence of the treaty fublishing between them, fent an army under Giovanni Francisco de Gonzaga to invade the Milanese, which obliged Philip. to recal Picinino from Tuscany. The Florentines made use of that opportunity to recover S. Maria in Castello, and all the other places that had been taken by Picinino. They likewife! besieged Camajore, which they took, together with Massa and Serazana; and about the beginning of May, 1437, Sforza laid fiege to Lucca itself. The Lucquese in vain applied to the duke of Milan for affiftance; and obtaining none, they abandoned all the open country, which was wasted by the Florent tines, and prepared to make a vigorous defence of their capital tal, which they fortified with new works. The Florentine? army, on the other hand, obliged Monte Carlo to furrender, and belieged Uzzano; so that Lucca was reduced to the utmost? The Lucquese, in this extremity, again applied to the duke of Milan so movingly, and so effectually, that he' determined to fend a great body of troops to their relief. The > a peace. Picinino attributed their inactivity to their cowardice,

A. D. J437.

Florentines, to divert this storm, applied to the Venetians; but Their difthe marquis of Mantua, who was in their pay, went over to ficulties. the service of the duke of Milan: upon which the Venetians threatened to disband their army, if Sforza was not fent to This request put the Florentines to great inconcommand it. veniences. On one hand, they saw the necessity of prosecuting, by way of diversion, the war in Lombardy; on the other, they were bent on the conquest of Lucca, in which they despaired of succeeding without Sforza. The latter had made it one of the conditions of his service, that he should not be obliged to pass the Pa; and he kept steady to that refolution, for fear of too much exasperating his seture fatherin-law the duke of Milan. The Venetians pretended, that without him they must be obliged to evacuate Lombardy; and the Florentines, to keep them in temper, prevailed on Sforza to write them a letter, promising that he would pass the Po. He accordingly, after making dispositions for continuing the siege of Lucca, went to Lombardy; and when he came to Reggio, the Venetians formally requested him to pass the Po. and head their forces, which he obstinately declined to do. Upon this, some reproachful language passed between him and Indrea Morosini, who had been sent from Venice to treat with him; but nothing could prevail with Sforza to break with Philip, in whose interest he all along was; and he returned to Tuscany, as Moresini did to Venice, after making a formal protest, that the Kenetians should be no longer obliged to give Sforza pay.

THE Florentines had foreseen this, and required him to The stege continue the fiege of Lucca, which he absolutely refused to do of Lucca till the Venetians should pay him his arrears; and the duke of raised. Milan was not wanting to improve the quarrel to his own interest. He promised Sforza, that he should consummate the marriage with his daughter, if he could bring about a peace between the Florentines and the Lucquese; and Sforza, dazzled with so illustrious an alliance, and in hopes of becoming duke of Milan (Philip having no male issue) intimated that he was resolved to break off all connections with the Florentines, who, he pretended, were unable to support him, now that they were abandoned by the Venetians. In this doubtful state of affairs, Cosmo de Medici, who was now at the head of the Florentine republic, and in high reputation all over Italy, went in person to Venice, where he laid before the fenate the dreadful confequences that must ensue to them, as well as the Florentines, if Philip and Sforza should join their forces. The matter was fully debated; but the Venetians, far from complying with Cosmo, inveighed bitterly against Sforza's ambition and infolence. They pretended, that he was in the Florentine service, and that they ought to pay him; that they were resolved to act upon the describe, and to suffer Sforza to take his course: so that Cosmo was obliged to return without succeeding in his commission. By this time the duke of Milan had brought over to his service Furlance, a generalofficer, on whom Sforza had great dependence; and this defection served him with a pretext to finish his treaty with Philip; one of the articles of which was, that he should take no farther concern in the affairs either of Tuscany or the Ro-This reconciliation, in fact, obliged the Florentines to relinquish all their designs against Lucca; and in April, 1438, a peace was concluded between them and the Lucquese, who were declared to be a free people; but the Florentines remained in possession of Monte-Carlo, and the other acquisitions they had made from the Lucquese.

463

They make peace.

Affairs of Italy.

UPON the death of Fortebrachio, which has been already mentioned, Poppi, whose daughter Fortebrachio had married, held S. Sepolchro as part of his daughter's dower, though demanded by the pope as belonging to him; and Poppi, finding himself unable to contest with his holiness, offered to deposit the place into the hands of the Florentines; but they refused it, for fear of giving umbrage to the pope, whom, at last, they prevailed upon to compromise the difference, by putting him in possession of S. Sepolchro, while he relinquished all his conquests in the Casantin, and returned them Prato, Vecchio, and Romena.

Dedication Florence.

It has been noted in history, that though the Florentines of the ca- were thus involved on every fide with difficulties and dangers, thedral of the magnificence and splendor of the city was as great as The affairs of the pope having obliged him to return to Florence, and their cathedral of S. Reparata being finished, it was now confecrated by his holiness. The pomp of this consecration is celebrated both by Aretin and Muchiavel; and the concourse of people was so great, that the inagistrates were obliged to erect a most magnificent platform for the procession, between the place of the pope's residence and the church that was to be confecrated. The pope encouraged this and all other extravagancies of that kind, that he might impress the emperor of Constantinople and his prelates, who were then at Florence, and treating of an accommodation with the Latin church, with high ideas of his grandeur d. A council was accordingly indicted at Ferrara, to perfect the reconciliation. 111

d Aretin, pag. 26;.

THE duke of Milan at this time was intent upon a war Craft of with the Venetians, whom he dreaded more than he did the the duke of Florentines. His secret aim was to retake Brescia and Ber- Milan and game; but perceiving that he would be opposed by the pope, Picinino. he secretly treated with Picinino to invade the Romagna; but not as his general, being bound up by his late treaty with Sforza from attacking any part of the papal dominions. The deceit was carried on so well, that Picinino over-reached his boliness, surprised Ravenna, Forli, Imola, and Bologna; subdued all the pope's possessions in the Romagna, and carried the war into Lombardy, where he besieged Brescia. Though all Italy was sensible of the collusion between the pope and Picinino, yet they continued to dissemble their engagements, and Philip openly disavowed all that Picinino had done. The Florentines applied for affiltance to Sforza, who durst not venture to disoblige Philip, and therefore remained neutral. Being disappointed in that quarter, they dropt all their resentments against the Venetians, and resolved to join them. In the mean while, they were greatly favoured by Philip's diffimulation, who found daily pretexts for putting off Sforza's marriage with his daughter, though he had fent him thirty thousand foring as part of her fortune. This did not satisfy Sforza, who saw into Philip's design, which was to keep him in a state of dependence till he was enabled, by his great success against the Venetians, to crush him. The Florentines again attempted to make him fensible of the duke's views, and fucceeded so far, at last, as to bring him into a confederacy with them and the Venetians. The conditions were, that the Venations should pay two thirds of the expence of the war. The semaining third was to be defrayed by the Florentines, and both republics engaged to defend Sforza's estate in Ancona and the Une difficulty, however, still remained, which was Sforza's absolutely refusing to pass the Po with his army. and to carry the war into the Milanefe.

ALL they could prevail upon him to do was to put himself Negociation at the head of the Venetian troops in the Paduan; but great quith Vedifficulties even in that occurring, Neri di Gino Capponi was nice. Sent ambassador to Venice, to concert measures for the preservation of both republics. Capponi was received with all the respect due to a sovereign prince; and having previously had a conserence with Sforza, he brought him to consent to pass the Po, and to march to the relief of Verona and Pisa, which were ready to fall under the power of the duke of Milan. A public audience was granted to Capponi in the Venetian senate, where he made a very fine speech, magnifying the friendship of Fiorence to her sister republic; and offered them

The war

in Lom-

bardy.

thousand horse and two thousand foot, to be employed where they thought proper. The senators were so much overjoyed at this proposal, which was greatly beyond their hopes, that, without waiting for the doge's answer, they embraced Cappeni with tears in their eyes as their common deliverer; and on the 20th of June, Sforza arrived with his army in the Padmen. and marched to the relief of Verona, which he effected, tho' opposed by all Picinino's power. He then proceeded to the relief of Brescia; but, an epidemical distemper happening amongst his troops, he was obliged to give over that enterprize, which gave Picinino great advantages. Sforza, however, refreshing his troops, again advanced to relieve Bresie. and came to a battle with Picinino, whose army was routed near Tenna, he himself almost miraculously escaping. But this victory was not improved as it might have been; and Picinino, having joined the remains of his army, surprised Verna, at a time when the Venetians thought him either dead, or. ruined beyond all possibility of recovery. Sforza was at Tenna when this unexpected news reached him; and, without losing a moment's time, he marched to retake Verona, before Picinino could complete the new fortifications he had defigned for its defence. Though Sforza undertook this expedition against the advice of all his general officers, yet it succeeded; for, making a feint as if he intended to march to Vicenza, he fuddenly turned short, and affaulting the unfinished works of Verona, while Picinino's soldiers were busy about the plunder, he carried the castle of S. Felice, and obliged Picinine and the marquis of Mantua to fave themselves by flight, and to rejoin their camp, which still remained before Brefcia.

Duke of raged at tines.

THE duke of Milan attributed all his misfortunes to the Milan en- Florentines, and resolved to be revenged. It was now the dead of winter; and Sforza, having thrown supplies of men. the Floren- and provisions into Brescia, went into quarters at Verme Many of the exiled Florentines, who formed an army of them: selves, were then at the court of Milan. The principles of patriotism were not perhaps so strong within them, as were those of revenge upon their enemies. All of them passionately wished to be restored to their country, and they were backed in their folicitations by Picinino, who pretended to be executer to Brachio, and fought to disposses Sforza in his absence. But all this could not be effected without a war; and so great was the duke's caution, that he would not declare himself on that head till he should hear all that could be urged for it. Picinine assured him, that the relief of Brescia was impracticable; and that the fiege might continue, though he should be fent with an army into Tuscany; that he would no sooner enter it, than the Florentines must be constrained either to submit to his will, or to recal Sforza; in either of which cases he must ac-The exiles gave the duke the strongest asquire a victory. furances, that his army would no fooner approach Florence, than the people, exasperated by taxes and tyrants, would declare unanimously for him; and that if he marched his army by the Casantine, it would meet with no opposition. duke, at last, seemed to be determined; and the rather as he knew that Giovanni Vetteleschi Cornettano, first apostolic notary, then bishop of Recanati, patriarch of Alexandria, and cardinal of Florence, who commanded the pope's armies, where he had more power than the pope himself, was their enemy, on account of their having formerly banished Rinaldo, while under the pope's protection. He was encouraged likewise by a coldness that was growing between the Venetians and Sforza. Notwithstanding the bitter inclemency of the season, they were perpetually importuning him to employ his whole force in the relief of Brescia, which he absolutely resused to undertake till the foring, when he could be affifted with a fleet.

THE Florentines were no strangers to what was in agita- Their tion against them, and began to reflect that the Venetians had crast. reaped the benefit of all they had done in Lornbardy. They imagined that Picinino never would have abandoned the fiege of Brescia, which was upon the point of surrendering, to march into Tuscany, unless he had been sure not only of being affilted by the army of the church, but of being joined by a party with whom he had correspondence in Florence. But their fears of Vetteleschi were soon quieted. We have several times taken notice of the excellent intelligence with which the Florentines always were furnished; and, like all other states, they fometimes employed means not strictly justifiable, particularly by spies and agents, who had the art of intercepting and inspecting letters. Some of those spies intercepted certain letters at Monte-Pulciano, a town in the Siennese, written in cypher by Vetteleschi to Picinino, which the Florentines sent to the pope. His holiness, who knew nothing of this correspondence e, not able to decypher the letters, and jealous of the patriarch's great power in the army, resolved to destroy him. To do it the more securely, he communicated his intention to Antonio Rido of Padua, governor of the castle of S. Angelo, ordering him to arrest the patriarch as soon as he could. An opportunity foon prefented. The patriarch was fecured while he was converling with Antonio upon the draw-bridge of the

[·] MACHIAVEL, book v.

Vettelefchi.

Death of castle. It was in vain for Antonio to endeavour to south his priioner under his reverse of fortune; for Vetteleschi, foreseeing his fate, died in a short time. Though we have given this important incident, as related by Machiavel, yet it feems, from the whole complexion of it, to have been a contrivance of the Florentines to work upon the pope's fears; or, which is more probable, a collusion between them and his holines, who, though he durst not avow it in the patriarch's time, was the friend of Florence.

A ireaty of seace.

THE death of Vetteleschi did not quiet the apprehensions of the Florentines on account of Picinino, who was then on his march. The pope, being now freed from his mafter, could not behold his advancing to Tuscany with indifference; and he came into a league with the Florentines and Venetians, engaging to hold in readiness four thousand horse and two thousand foot, for the defence of the Florentine dominions. now remained for the safety of the Florentines, but to make up the breach between Sforza and the Venetians. For this purpose they deputed Neri di Gino Capponi and Giuliano d' Avanzati to go to Venice. While they were on the road, they understood that Picinino had passed the Po with six thousand horse; and when they came to Venice, they found that senage in a state of despondency at Brescia not being relieved; and Capponi, as he had been instructed, set out for Ferang, to confer with Sforza on that head. The latter gave him many military reasons why it was impracticable to relieve Brescia at that feason; but, after several conferences, at which the Ventian deputies likewise affisted, it was agreed, that Sforza should. receive eighty thousand, and each of the soldiers forty ducats, if he would immediately take the field, so as to oblige the duke of Milan to recal Picinino. The Venetians, who both hated and feared Sforza, durst not dispute those terms; but they trifled egregiously in fulfilling them, and a new scene opened in Tulcany.

War re-

PICININO, having passed the Po, marched towards nerved in the Romagna, where he was joined by the Malatefla family, Tuscany. upon whose friendship both the Florentines and Venetions had great dependence; and the latter were afraid that their general Orfino, who lay on the frontiers of the Romagna with at atmy, should be defeated. This desertion of the Malatesta alarmed Sforza so much for his own dominions in the marquisate of Ancona, that he repaired to Venice, where he told the fenate, in a full affembly, that their only course now was to transfer the feat of war to Tufcany; declaring, at the fame time, that as he came into Lombardy a fovereign prince, he was determined not to leave it a private subject. This pro-Polal posal was strenuously opposed by the senate; and all that either party could be brought to consent to, was to wait for a few days, till it should be known what turn affairs would take in Tuscany and the Romagna, and how the pope was disposed towards his new allies. Intelligence soon came, that the pope still continued steady in the league, that Orsino was retired with his army to Tuscany, and that the Malatesta family had, in fact, been forced into their connections with Picinino. Sforza's apprehensions were calmed by those accounts, and he consented that Capponi should return to Tuscany with fifteen hundred horse of his army; but engaged him at the same time to let him know of Picinino's progress, promising, in case of danger, to leave all other concerns, and march to oppose him.

PICININO, having fettled his affairs in the Romagna, Florence intended to force his way into Tuscany over the Appennines, attacked and by the valley of Montone; but he found the passes there by Picinilo well guarded by Nicolo de Pisa, that he failed in his attempt, no: He therefore turned off towards Maraddi, another pass of the Appennines, which was guarded by Orlandini, a Florentine knight, whom he knew to be a coward. The pass, though not fortified, was defensible against all Picinino's force, and the inhabitants were willing and brave; but the governor no fooner heard of Picinino's approach, than he withdrew to Burgo S. Lorenzo: fo that Picinino entered the pass without relistance, and marched directly towards the valley of Mugelli, where he took some forts, and besieged Monte-Pulciano. While this fiege lasted, he sent out parties, who over-ran and plundered the whole neighbouring country, and carried their incursions to within three miles of Florence itself. Elerentines, being now affured of support, were not so much starmed as they usually had been with their danger. internal diffentions and jealousies had been quieted by the prudence and credit of Cosmo de Medici, who was beloved by all parties in the state. They knew the pope's auxiliaries were on their march, and the detachment under Capponi had already arrived at Rorence. His arrival gave great spirit to the citizens; and as he was known to be an able officer, they committed to him the defence of their capital. He foon railed an army, with which he retook Remoli from Picinino. whose quarters he likewise straitened so much, that he was obliged to remove to a greater distance from Florence.

PICININO, when he carried his arms into Tuscany, had great dependence upon an insurrection in Florence, of which he had assurances from the Tuscan exiles. Being disappointed of that, he resolved, if possible, to draw Capponi to a battle. Francesco, count of Poppi, who held considerable commands under the Florentines, had, from the affection he bore to Rinaldo de Albizi, deserted them, and joined Pichine as foon as he entered Tuscany. By his advice, Picinim marched into the Cafantine, where he took Bibienna and Remena, and befieged the castle of S. Nicolas, which stands on the confines of the Casartine and the vale of Arno. This castle, which was strong, made so good a desence, that the Florentines had time to draw together three thousand horse, the command of which they gave to Orsino, under whom Papponi and Bernardo de Medici served. The castle of S. Nicolas had now held out about thirty days, and messengers were fent from the garrison to the Florentine generals to implore their relief. The generals, after reconnoitring the fituation of the place, and the dispositions of the enemy, judged that the attempt was impracticable; and after highly commending the fidelity of the inhabitants, they gave them leave to furrender, which they did on the 32d day of the fiege.

his injudicious proceeding.

MACHIAVEL f is justly of opinion, that Picinials marching to the Cafantine was the ruin of his expedition, and that he would have succeeded much better, had he continued the feat of war near Piorence, where the citizens would have been foon tired of the expence attending it. But he was over-persuaded by count Poppi, who had private views of revenge to gratify. After reducing the castle of S. Nicolas, Picinino took Rassina and Chiust; and the count endeavoured to persuade him to remain in that country; but it proved so rocky, that Picining dryly told him his horses could not est itiones; and therefore he fell back to Borgo S. Sepolebro, in hopes of making himself master of Citta di Castello; but in this he failed, the inhabitants being in strict friendship with the Florentines. He made the like attempt upon the Pertgians, and he entered Perugia, where the pope had a legate. The citizens treated him with civility, though he failed in his negociation; but he extorted from the inhabitants a contibution of eight thousand crowns. His next attempt was upon Cortona, then in the possession of the Florentines; and he formed a party in the city, which was to be delivered up to him in the night-time. The conspiracy, however, was discovered to Bartolomeo Senso, one of the citizens, and defeated; so that Picinino, who was waiting at the gate, was obliged to return to his quarters.

WHILE Picinino, who appears to have been a braver general than he was an able politician, was proceeding thus un-

f Machiavel, book v.

uccessfully in Tuscany and the Romagna, matters in Lombardy aid not wear a more favourable aspect for the duke of Alilan. Sferza, perceiving his own dominions were out of danger, early in the spring made dispositions for raising the slege of Brescia. A. D. Being furnished by the Venetians with shipping, he entered 1440. the lakes that furrounded it, where he defeated the Milanele leet, and retook all the neighbouring castles, which had been garrisoned by Philip, and this obliced his land-troops to Thus Brescia, after a long siege, was relieved. Brescia re-The Milanese army retreated to Soncino on the Ocho, from lieved. whence they were driven by Sforza to Cremona, where the duke of Milan made a stand; and in the mean time he sent politive orders for Picinino to evacuate Tuscany, and join him as foon as possible.

According to the best accounts s, the city of Flerence Disturb was then under an excellent government. The fear of Pici-ances at nine had driven all the country people into their capital; so Florence. that a scarcity of provisions was dreaded, which might bring on mutinies and revolts. The wifer part of the Florentines however uniting, as we have already feen, under Cosino, a most excellent choice was made of the ten field-deputies, now called the council of ten; and Aretin, the historian, was contiqued for two years in that station. By the time that Picinino received the duke of Milan's orders for his return to Lombardy, the Florentine army was complete, by the junction of the troops of their allies. Their own force amounted to four thousand foot, and the horse which were brought out of Lembardy were commanded by Michalotti, as the foot were by Orfine. They were joined by two thousand of the pope's civalry at Arezzo; and their whole army, being in high fpiits, advanced to Angliari, Capponi having the chief command over the whole. While they lay at Anghiari, which is a caftle feated at the foot of the mountains dividing the vales of Tevere and Chiana, the magistrates of Florence received intelligence of Picining's recal, together with Sforza's fuccesses; and fent orders to their deputies not to hazard a battle, as they might gain all their ends without bloodfied. The Flaratine exiles came to the knowledge of these orders, and, informing Picinino of them, they perfuaded him that the Firratine army, thinking themselves perfectly secure, might be cally furprifed, and that he had it now in his power to retrieve all his past disappointments by a glorious victory. Picinino believed all they faid, and prevailed with the people of Borgo S. Sepilebro to join him with between two and three thousand men, in hopes of sharing in his spoils. According to Machidvel b, this plan of furprizal was very near fucceeding; but Aretin 1, perhaps for private reasons, conceals the circumstances.

E ARETIN, P 266. MACHIAVEL, ibid.

Picinino defeated.

THE Florentine army lay encamped on a fine level ground under the walls of Anghiari, and that of Picinine advanced with the utmost silence and secrecy between Borgo S. Sepolchro and Citta di Castello. According to Machiavel, his approach was not perceived (A) till Michalotti, discovering a great dust, the weather being then excessively hot, gave the alarm; and it was with the utmost difficulty that he and the other generalofficers could affemble their troops, which were carelefly difperfed through the fields, or encamped without order or regularity. They got, however, under arms before Picining whose men were terribly fatigued by the heat and length of the march, could attack them. Michalotti commanded the van of the Florentine army, and marched down to dispute a. bridge over which the enemy must pass. His promptness and presence of mind probably saved the Florentine army, because he held the enemy in play till the other generals drew up a line of infantry on each of his flanks. Michalotti repelled the first charge; but it was renewed with so much fury by Picinino in person, that Michalotti was driven from the bridge to the soot of the hill on which Anghiari stands. But Picinino's men, in the pursuit, were flanked by the Florentine infantry, who plied them from their cross-bows; so that Picinino was again driven. back to the bridge, where the dispute continued very sharp for two hours; during which it had been lost and won several times by both parties: but Picinino's men were obliged to advance thro' a defile, and could only act in front; a circumstance; that gave the victory to the Florentines. For the latter making a furious charge, drove the van of their enemies upon their center, and their center falling back on their rear, their whole army fell into disorder, and a total rout ensued, most of them flying towards Borgo S. Sepolchro. The Florentines were in much better condition than their enemies, who had not now strength for flying, and were taken prisoners almost without resistance, not above one thousand of them, and those too horse, with Picinino at their head, escaping to Borgo. flaughter however, though the dispute lasted four hours, con-

(A) Aretin, ubi supra, tells the walls of Anghiari, which the

h MACHIAVEL, ibid.

i Aretin, ubi supra.

us, that the Florentine army, more emboldened Picinine to atbeing afraid of a surprize, had tack them, as thinking they were drawn themselves up close to afraid.

lifted but in one man, who fell from his horse, and was trod to death. The reasons why the victory was so bloodless, were, first, the almost impenetrable armour in which the troops on both fides were cased; and, secondly, the avarice of the Florentine army, which was composed of mercenaries, who found their account in the ransom of the prisoners, and fherefore they made as many as they could. Two thousand two hundred of the inhabitants of Borgo S. Sepolebro were taken, and put to ransom; so that the booty made by the Florentine army, in men, horses, money, and baggage, was very considerable.

HAD the Florentines followed their blow, they might have Bad diftaken Borgo S. Sepolchro, while Picinino was within it; but cipline of their avarice was such, that they refused to proceed on any the Floother service till they had secured their booty and their pri- rentines. foners in Arezzo, which they accordingly did, none of the Florentine generals or commanders having authority enough to ftop them.

PICININO laid hold of that opportunity to escape with the remains of his army from Borgo, and he was followed by all the Florentine exiles, who, feeing their hopes of returning to their country now at an end, dispersed themklves into different places and countries. Ringlilo de Albizi retired to Ancona, and from thence visited the sepulchre of Fesus Christ at Jerusalem. Upon his return from thence, he was so fortunate, says Machiavel, as to die on the least unhappy day Death of of all his exile, which was that of his daughter's marriage.

UPON the return of the Florentine troops from Arezzo, War in the they presented themselves before Borgo; the inhabitants of Casautine. which offered to furrender upon terms, which were refused them by the Florentines. The legate of the Holy See, to whom the town belonged, apprehending that the Flor entines intended to make it their own, interposed, and thereby prevented their designs. In the mean while, the latter were at a loss to know the route that Picinino had taken. some affirming that he had gone to Rome, and others to I_n . was. Upon this, the Florentine army divided itself. One party was appointed to march under Bernardo de Medici to Perugia, as the most proper station for succouring the dominions of his holiness, or of Sforza, should either of them be The other division was sent into the Casantine under the command of Capponi, who soon retook Rassma, Bibienna, Prato, Vecchio, and Romena. Capponi then laid siege to Poppi, where the count was. The place was strong, and might have made a vigorous defence, had it not disfurnished its for all its provisions and necessaries to supply Picinino's

After the fiege was formed, the count offered to capitulate; but so exasperated were the Florentines at his conduct, that he could obtain no terms, but the liberty of departing with his wife, children, and portable goods; and that he should leave the Florentines in possession of all his estates.

THE count thought those terms extremely hard, and dewantage of manded a parley with Capponi upon a bridge over the Arm, Florence, which was granted him, and where he made a speech to move the conqueror's compassion, who rejected all his requests, and stuck by the terms that had been offered him (A). The count, with great indignation, submitted to his fate, and thus lost an estate which had been transmitted to him. from father to fon, for four hundred years.

The quar continues in Tuscany.

THE gaining of the battle of Anghiari did vast service to the Florentines, because it preserved their independency; but was of no farther prejudice to the duke of Milan, than obliging him to ranfom his foldiers, and remount his ca-The Florentine foldiery were enriched by it, each man's booty and prisoners being his own property; but no advantage accrued thereby to the state. Thus, as Machiavelk well observes, a general, or a prince, had it always in his power to replace, with ready money, the arms and horses. he had loft, and in a very short time again to appear in the field as formidable as ever. The consequence of this to the conquerors, as well as the conquered, was, that both were obliged to make fresh demands of money upon their subjects; the former, to continue and improve the advantages they had obtained; and the latter, to repair the losses they had fuffered.

Danger of Milan.

PICININO, after his defeat at Anghiari, in a few weeks the duke of was stronger in the field than he had been at the beginning of the campaign, and this gave a new turn to the affairs of The duke of Milan, after his retreat to Cremona, was so pressed by Sforza, that he was obliged to employ Ni-* cholas d'Este, prince of Ferrara, to mediate a peace, not so much with the Venetians, as with their general. D'Efte ac-

MACHIAVEL, book vi.

(A) The reader may have fome idea of the authenticity of the speeches he so often meets with in the Italian and the other historians of those times, when we inform him, that the speech put into the count of Poppi's mouth on this occasion, by so great a man, and so able a writer as Machiavel, is an almost literal translation of the famous. one which Tacitus says was pronounced by the British Garallacus, when he appeared at Reme in chains before the tribunal of the emperor Claudius.

cordinely

tordingly repaired to Pefchiera, where Sforza then was, and laid before him the confequences of the duke of Milan's being crushed by the Venetians and the Florentines, who, when they had obtained their ends of him, would difregard Sforza, and reduce him to their own terms. He then, in the duke's name, offered to renew the treaty of marriage between his daughter and Sforza; and that the young lady should be sent to Forrara, where he might espouse her as soon as the peace was finished.

SFORZA knew that a great deal of what the prince had Atreaty of faid was true; but he was too well acquainted with the duke peace. to trust him. He declared, that he had been so often baffled and disappointed in the marriage, that he could rely on no proposal of that kind; but that if the duke would conclude a peace with the Florentines and the Venetians, who were equally defineus of it as he was, he would conduct himself in that. and all other affairs, as his friends should advise him. withstanding this unpromising answer, D'Este's negotiation had great effects in the duke of Milan's favour. It revived the secret ambition Sforza had always entertained of becoming one day duke of Milan, and made him act more coolly gainst Philip. The Venetians, on the other hand, could not ter to fee their general negotiate a separate treaty with their themy, and they grew backward in furnishing him with supplies for the war; thus the time of action passed over without any thing remarkable being done in the field in Lombody; and Picinino, arriving there the beginning of winter, all the armies retired into winter-quarters. Sforza's went into the Veronese, the duke of Milan's into the Cremonese, that of Florence returned to Tuleany, and that of the pope into 🗽 Remagna.

It is hardly credible how averse the people of Italy still Aversion where to the temporal government of the pope. The inhabi- of the Italian of Balogna and Forli had submitted to Picinino, who had lians to the french has son the government of them. After the battle of Pope.

Aphari, his holiness attempted to reduce them; but they were so bravely defended by young Picinino, that he sailed has purpose. The inhabitants of Ravenna, however, alamed at the neighbourhood of the pope's army, and leading to fall again under his power, persuaded Ostasio of Polinia, who was their lord, to consent to surrender their and territory to the Venetians, who, fearing that so notes a prize might be retaken from them, sent Ostasio and his prisoners to Candia, where they died. Neither were the retainer wholly without their indemnishication for the extens they had sustained by the war; for his holiness found his finances so exhausted, that he sold to them the to Borgo St. Sepolchro, for the small consideration of twee thousand ducats.

Ŧ

MOD. HIST, VOL. XXXVI.

War renewed in Lombardy

THE face of affairs was now changed in Lombardy. the return of Picinino, the duke of Milan, who had tak to ransom all his soldiers who had been made prisoner battle of Anghiari, foon remounted his cavalry, dropt all mention of peace, and, though it was yet winter, Picinino in a condition to make a better figure in t than ever. The Venetians, on the other hand, inter new acquisitions, and still jealous of Sforza, had ne the war in Lombardy; and Sforza was obliged to go in to Venice, to concert with the senate the operations ensuing campaign. While he was there, Ciarpellone, Sforza's best officers, entered into the duke of Mila vice; and Picinino, passing the Adda, took possession of tract of country near Brescia, and, at the same tin prised and carried off two thousand of Sforza's horses. news obliged Sforza to break off his conferences at but he first prevailed with the Venetians to recal their from Tuscany, and to give the command of them to I man Michalotti.

between Sforza By this time Picinino had returned to winter-quarte in the spring he besieged Cignano, a sortress about miles from Brescia. Sforza marched to relieve it, an same time besieged Martinengo. Both generals, on t casion, displayed all the art of war then in use; but tune of Picinino prevailed; for, leaving Cignano, he la to Bergamo, while Sforza was before Martinengo, wh well provided for a desence; but Picinino gained a pos cut Sforza off from all his provisions, and was at the impregnable, so that Sforza's army was more est besieged than Martinengo was by him; and there was a bility that they must in a sew days surrender prisoners of and Picinino. NOTHING can give us a better idea of the spirit mercenaries of that age than Picinino's conduct on the fion. Having made such dispositions, that he though impossible for Sforza and his army to escape, he fen quaint the duke of Milan that it was now in his (Pipower, to make him master of all Lombardy; but the serving him a long time in the field, he had not gal himself for much earth as would bury him; that, as tory was certain, so should the reward be, and then demanded the city and territory of Piacenza, where he repose himself after his labours. This insolent med duced the duke of Milan, in good earnest, to tre

Sfirza. He fent to him Antonio Guido Buono of Fortona, and offered instantly to conclude the marriage between him and his daughter, and to give in dower with her the city of Cremona, with other advantageous terms, both for him and the Vactions. These were readily embraced, and the treaty was privately agreed to by all parties. The duke of Milan, upon this, fent a positive order for Picinino to make a truce with Sforza for a year. Picinino, alarmed and confounded by this order, made such difficulties to obey it, that the duke was obliged to threaten to withdraw from him his protection, and to give him up either to his own foldiers, or his enemies. Sforza Picinino thus finding the duke resolute, obeyed, but with the marries the utmost reluctance; and Sforza's marriage with Biancha, the duke of duke's daughter, was celebrated, and all the other terms of Milan's

the peace complied with.

In November 1441, the late treaty between the duke of A.D. Milan, the Venetians, and the Florentines, was ratified; and by that the Venctions gained Pefchiera, Afola, and Leonato, for Peace rds tress in the Mantuan. But while peace was thus restored tify'd. to Lombardy, a new war was kindled up in the kingdom of Naples, where Aiphonfo, who had prevailed over his antagonifts Reguier, seized upon Benevento, and all Sforza's estates. Upon this Regnier, who still held the city of Naples, invited Sforza to join him, while Alphonfo earnestly applied to him former ally the duke of Milan, to prevail with him to give Sprza such a diversion, as that he might be of no service to Regnier. The duke, notwithstanding the late peace concluded in Lombardy, entered into Alphonso's views, by prevailing with the pope to attempt to retake the estates which had been dismembered from the church's patrimony by Sforza. Those estates were very considerable, and had again and again been confirmed to Sforza by the popes, though he made little account of their authority. Pope Eugene, encouraged by the duke of Milan, who offered to send Piciting and his army to his affiftance, which he did, took the field, and began hostilities against Sforza's dominions in the marquisate of Sforza, being thus obliged to march to the relief of his own dominions, Alphonso took Naples, and forced his competitor to take refuge at Florence, where he was kindly received, and from whence he went to Marfeilles. Picinino, and the pope's troops, prevailing against Sforza in the marquifate, he was obliged to apply to the Florentines and the Venetians for affiftance. Annibal Bentivoglio of Bologna, some time before this, had follicited affistance from the Florentines against Picinino, and they had favoured his request, so that they could not immediately return an answer to Sforza, who re-daughter.

War in Tuscany,

which is presented to them, that the liberties of all Italy were on the point of being swallowed up by three great powers; the duke of Milan, the pope, and the king of Naples. This confideration, and the success of Bentivoglie against Picinine, determined them to affist Sforza; but, if possible, without breaking with the duke of Milan, who had no farther concorn in the war than to obtain the quiet possession of the kingdom of Naples for Alphonso, which was now effected. The Florentines therefore fent a deputation, frankly telling the duke that they intended to affift his fon-in-law; but requesting him, at the same time, to renew his league with them. The duke not only readily agreed to this, but preinvaded by vailed with Alphonso to desist from all hostilities in Ancons, Alphonio. and retire to Nuples; while the Florentines furnished Sforts with the affistance he required.

IT is certain, from the prodigious success of the Florentius, in diffipating or disappointing the powerful confederacks formed against them, that their internal government, for fome time, had been in able hands; but the pestilence, common to popular establishments, now broke out. Neri di Capponi became so popular, by his own great services to the flate, and those of his sather, who had reduced Pifa, that Cofme & Medici grew jealous of him; not from any malevolence in his own nature, but because he well knew that two interests, of the same authority, could not long subsist in a popular state without one of them being ruined. Baldaccio of Ingbiari was then general of the Florentine infantry; a man, who, in accomplishments, virtue, courage, and personal qualifications, was second to none in Italy. An intimate friendship, of the most laudable kind, subsisted between him and Capponi; and his credit with the troops was fo great, that it was dangerous to proceed against him in the ordinary forms of justice, though his crimes were no other than his abilities and his popularity. Cappeni's enemies thought it necessary to humble him, by taking off Baldaccio; and they had a most convenient tool for that purpose in Orlandini, the same who had so infamously betrayed the pass of Maraddi to Picinina, being then gonfalonier of the people. Baldaccio, before Orlandon was advanced to that high station, had often bitterly itproached him for his cowardly conduct; and his enemies improved Orlandini's refentment, so as to make him resolve to affassinate Baldaccio. For this purpose, he engaged some suffians, whom he concealed within his apartments in the pa-

ments, where he was affaffinated by the ruffians. barity of Baldaccio's enemies was not farisfied with his death. His body was thrown out of one of the windows of the palace, and his head being cut off, was exposed a whole day to the people. Machiavela himself pays a just tribute of praise on this occasion to the memory of Baldaccio's widow Annaleria, the mother of his only fon, who refusing, after her husband's death, the most advantageous matches, affociated herself with some noble matrons of her own principles, converted her house to a monastery, and there lived and died in holy retirement.

No internal commotion followed the infamous affaffination of Baldaccio; so prosound, at this time, was the veneration of the Florentines for their legal governors, whose ten years power was now almost expired. But in the year 1444 a new Balia was erected, which continued them in their offices, gave them new powers, and, by virtue of those, they turned New reguout of authority all whom they so much as suspected to be lations in their enemies; some of whom they imprisoned, and banished Florence. others, every thing being now fettled according to the mind of the governing party in Florence. They then applied themkelves to foreign affairs. Picinino, though abandoned by Al-Monfo, and not countenanced by the duke of Milan, still continued the war in the Romagna; but was defeated by Sforza, through the affiltance lent him by the Florentines, and obliged to take refuge in Montecchio. Here he fortified himself so effectually as to bid defiance to Sforza, who, knowing his active genius, applied to the duke of Milan to recal im. Before the duke came to a determination, Picinino and re-affembled his troops, and, by the affiftance of Alphonfo and the pope, took the field at the head of an army far fuction to that of Sforza. Upon this the duke of Milan sent message for Picinine to confer with him, which was so well received, that Picinino, leaving the command of his army to ion Francis, posted to Milan. Sforza did not omit that portunity of attacking Picinino's army, which he entirely. deated, and took Francis prisoner. Picining, upon the Death of was of this defeat, and his perceiving that he was deceived Picining. by the duke of Milan, died of heart-break in the year 1445. him the hopes of the Brachian forces, between whom, and stide of Sforza, all Italy had been so long divided, were exinguished. The scale of war had been long suspended beween those two bodies of mercenaries, each of whom was The first Sforza, from a mean birth, came to be a confiderable prince. Brachio's birth was noble, as were his actions, in which he rivalled Sforza; but he died as a mercenary, and the same rivalship which had subsisted between the first Sforza and Brachio, descended to the second Sforza and Picinino, the companion and inheritor of Brachio's fortunes. It is however evident, that the genius of the younger Sforza had the ascendant over that of Picinino, who was a brave and an able commander, but desective in judgment every where but in action.

1445.

² Machiavel, book vi.

UPON the death of Picinino, and the defeat of his forces,

A peace eg uluded.

the pope, not daring to trust to the king of Naples, employed the Florentines to mediate a peace for him with Sforza; in which they succeeded, and by it Oscimo, Recanuti, and Fabriano, a village equal to most cities, were yielded to the pope, and Sforza was continued in all his other possessions in the marquifate of Ancona: and thus the peace of Italy feemed to be for some time secured, when it was again disturbed by the Bolognese. Annibal Bentivoglis, who had driven Picinim out of Bologna, had formed a league between the Bolognese, the Florentines, and Venetians, at which the duke of Milan was fecretly uneasy. Battista Canneschi, the head of a powerful family in the Bolognese, and in alliance, but not in friendship, with that of Bentivoglio, knew that the duke of Milan's great ambition was to become master of that city; and Battista engaged to put him in possession of it, by dispatching his rival Bentivoglio, which he actually did on the twentyfourth of June, 1445. He had been promised to be supported by the duke of Milan; and the Venetian and Florenting deputies then residing at Bologna, not knowing how far the conspiracy might extend, confined themselves to their own The Bolognese, however, in general detesting the affassination of Bentivoglio, ran to arms, defeated the Can neschi family and party, drove them out of the city, and dragging Battifta from a corn-cheft where he had concealed himself, put him to death, no succours from the duke of Milan having appeared. The Bolognese were now at a loss for a head. They adored the Bentivoglio family; but Annibal had left behind him only a fon of fix years old, and his relation began to quarrel amongst themselves about the government of The count of Poppi, whom we have already menthe city. tioned, was then at Bologna; and, perceiving how the city was divided, he intimated to some of the leading men, that he could furnish them with a descendant from Annibal Bent voglio, who could head them. Upon enquiry, he affirmed that Hercules, the fon of Annibal, happening about twenty years before to be at Poppi, had begot a fon called Santis

Affairs of Bologna.

whose countenance resembled Hercules so much, that it was a sufficient proof of his original. He added, that Hercules had always acknowledged him to be his, though the mother, who was married, had educated him as the son of her husband, who was now dead, and whose name was Agnolo Cascefe. The Bolognese, eagerly attached to the Bentivoglio fanily, eagerly embraced the proposal, and sent deputies to he Florentines, in whole possession the count's estates were, o fend the young man, who was now about twenty years of ge, to take upon him the administration of their affairs. he matter was referred to Cosmo de Medici, and Neri di Caponi; but they proceeded cautiously. The youth was then ving with his reputed uncle Antonio Cascese, who being rich. nd childless, intended to make him his heir; a prospect which the young man thought preserable to his promised reatness. Being sent for to appear before Cosmo and the Bognefe deputies, the latter no sooner saw him than they reognized and almost adored him; but still the youth seemed be backward as to the proposal. At last, Cosmo taking him side, talked to him, according to Muchiavel', in the folwing terms. " None can in this case advise thee better than thyself, for thou art to make that choice which thou findest thy own soul inclinable to; and if thou be the son of Hercules Bentiveglio, thou wilt dispose thyself to actions worthy that house and family; but if thou be the son of " Agnol's Cascese, thou wilt content thyself to stay in Florence, "and follow his mean trade of dreffing wool." Those words rouled the youth to ambition. He resigned himself entirely WCosmo and Capponi, who persuaded the Florentines to furnish with dress and equipages suiting the station to which he called; and he fet out for Bologna, where he received charge of the Bentivoglio family, which he managed with butuch prudence, that he lived with honour, and died in Pice; a happiness denied to his ancestors.

THE duke of Milan, after Picinino's death, being at a loss Ciarpela general to command his troops, treated with Ciarpellone lone put to ballie-mentioned, to whom he had given some possessions in death. Milanese. Sforza had some notice of the negotiation; when Ciarpellone applied for leave to repair to the Mila-Sforza laid him under arrest, and then put him to death. This incident was far from being displeasing to the Florentines, were apprehensive of nothing more than they were of good understanding between Sforza and the duke of Miwho hearing the cause of Ciarpellone's death, resolved to

blid. book vi.

came to be a confiderable prince. Brachio's birth was noble. as were his actions, in which he rivalled Sforza; but he died as a mercenary, and the same rivalship which had sublisted between the first Sforza and Brachio, descended to the second Sforza and Picinino, the companion and inheritor of Bracho's fortunes. It is however evident, that the genius of the younger Sforza had the ascendant over that of Picining, who was a brave and an able commander, but defective in judg. ment every where but in action.

Upon the death of Picinino, and the defeat of his forces,

A peace

concluded. the pope, not daring to trust to the king of Naples, employed the Florentines to mediate a peace for him with Sforza; in which they succeeded, and by it Oscimo, Recanati, and Fabriano, a village equal to most cities, were yielded to the pope, and Sforza was continued in all his other possessions in the marquifate of Ancona: and thus the peace of Italy feemed to be for some time secured, when it was again disturbed by the Bolognese. Annibal Bentivoglis, who had driven Picinin out of Bologna, had formed a league between the Bolognese, the Florentines, and Venetians, at which the duke of Milan was secretly uneasy. Battista Canneschi, the head of a powerful family in the Bolognese, and in alliance, but not in friendship, with that of Bentivoglio, knew that the duke of Milan's great ambition was to become master of that city; and Battista engaged to put him in possession of it, by dispatching his rival Bentivoglio, which he actually did on the twentyfourth of June, 1445. He had been promised to be supported by the duke of Milan; and the Venetian and Florenting deputies then residing at Bologna, not knowing how far the conspiracy might extend, confined themselves to their own Affairs of houses. The Bolognese, however, in general detesting the affassination of Bentivoglio, ran to arms, defeated the Conneschi family and party, drove them out of the city, and dragging Battifta from a corn-cheft where he had concealed himself, put him to death, no succours from the duke of Milan having appeared. The Bolognese were now at a loss for a head. They adored the Bentivoglio family; but Annibal had left behind him only a fon of fix years old, and his relation began to quarrel amongst themselves about the government of The count of Poppi, whom we have already menthe city. tioned, was then at Bologna; and, perceiving how the city was divided, he intimated to fome of the leading men, that he could furnish them with a descendant from Annibal Bestie voglio, who could head them. Upon enquiry, he affirmed that Hercules, the fon of Annibal, happening about twenty years before to be at Poppi, had begot a fon called Santi-

whose countenance resembled Hercules so much, that it was a sufficient proof of his original. He added, that Hercules had always acknowledged him to be his, though the mother, who was married, had educated him as the son of her husand, who was now dead, and whose name was Agnolo Casrefe. The Bolognese, eagerly attached to the Bentivoglio fanily, eagerly embraced the proposal, and sent deputies to he Florentines, in whose possession the count's estates were, o fend the young man, who was now about twenty years of ge, to take upon him the administration of their affairs. he matter was referred to Cosmo de Medici, and Neri di Capmi; but they proceeded cautiously. The youth was then ving with his reputed uncle Antonio Cascese, who being rich, and childless, intended to make him his heir; a prospect mich the young man thought preserable to his promised reatness. Being sent for to appear before Cosmo and the Bognese deputies, the latter no sooner saw him than they reognized and almost adored him; but still the youth seemed be backward as to the proposal. At last, Cosmo taking him side, talked to him, according to Muchiavel, in the folwing terms. "None can in this case advise thee better than thyself, for thou art to make that choice which thou findest thy own soul inclinable to; and if thou be the son of Hercules Bentiveglio, thou wilt dispose thyself to actions worthy that house and family; but if thou be the son of " Agnol's Cascese, thou wilt content thyself to stay in Florence, "and follow his mean trade of dressing wool." Those words wouled the youth to ambition. He resigned himself entirely WCosmo and Capponi, who persuaded the Florentines to furnish with dress and equipages suiting the station to which he via called; and he fet out for Bologna, where he received charge of the Bentivoglio family, which he managed with butuch prudence, that he lived with honour, and died in Pice; a happiness denied to his ancestors.

THE duke of Milan, after Picinino's death, being at a loss Ciarpelin a general to command his troops, treated with Ciarpellone lone put to believe-mentioned, to whom he had given some possessions in death. the Milanefe. Sforza had some notice of the negotiation; when Ciarpellone applied for leave to repair to the Mila-Mr. Sforza laid him under arrest, and then put him to death. In incident was far from being displeasing to the Florentines, were apprehensive of nothing more than they were of good understanding between Sforza and the duke of Miwho hearing the cause of Ciarpellone's death, resolved to

blook vi.

came to be a confiderable prince. Brachio's birth was noble. as were his actions, in which he rivalled Sforza; but he died as a mercenary, and the same rivalship which had subsisted between the first Sforza and Brachio, descended to the second Sforza and Picinino, the companion and inheritor of Brachio's fortunes. It is however evident, that the genius of the younger Sforza had the ascendant over that of Picining, who was a brave and an able commander, but defective in judgment every where but in action.

Upon the death of Picinino, and the defeat of his forces,

A peace

concluded. the pope, not daring to trust to the king of Naples, employed the Florentines to mediate a peace for him with Sforza; in which they succeeded, and by it Oscimo, Recanuti, and Fabriano, a village equal to most cities, were yielded to the pope, and Sforza was continued in all his other possessions in the marquifate of Ancona: and thus the peace of Italy feemed to be for forme time secured, when it was again disturbed by the Bolognese. Annihal Bentivoglis, who had driven Picinin out of Bologna, had formed a league between the Bolognese, the Florentines, and Venetians, at which the duke of Milan was secretly uneasy. Battista Canneschi, the head of a powerful family in the Bolognese, and in alliance, but not in friendship, with that of Bentivoglio, knew that the duke of Milan's great ambition was to become master of that city; and Battista engaged to put him in possession of it, by dispatching his rival Bentivoglio, which he actually did on the twentyfourth of June, 1445. He had been promised to be supported by the duke of Milan; and the Venetian and Florenting deputies then residing at Bologna, not knowing how far the conspiracy might extend, confined themselves to their own The Bolognese, however, in general detesting the affassination of Bentivoglio, ran to arms, defeated the County neschi family and party, drove them out of the city, and dragging Battiffa from a corn-cheft where he had concealed himself, put him to death, no succours from the duke of Milan having appeared. The Bolognese were now at a loss for a head. They adored the Bentivoglio family; but Annibal had left behind him only a son of six years old, and his relation began to quarrel amongst themselves about the government of The count of Poppi, whom we have already menthe city. tioned, was then at Bologna; and, perceiving how the was divided, he intimated to fome of the leading men, that he could furnish them with a descendant from Annibal Bestie voglio, who could head them. Upon enquiry, he affirmed that Hercules, the fon of Annibal, happening about twenty years before to be at Poppi, had begot a fon called Santi-

Affairs of houses.

whose countenance resembled Hercules so much, that it was a fufficient proof of his original. He added, that Hercules had always acknowledged him to be his, though the mother, who was married, had educated him as the son of her husband, who was now dead, and whose name was Agnolo Cascefe. The Bolognese, eagerly attached to the Bentivoglio fanily, eagerly embraced the proposal, and fent deputies to he Florentines, in whole possession the count's estates were, o fend the young man, who was now about twenty years of ge, to take upon him the administration of their affairs. I he matter was referred to Cosmo de Medici, and Neri di Caponi; but they proceeded cautiously. The youth was then iving with his reputed uncle Antonio Cascese, who being rich. nd childless, intended to make him his heir; a prospect rhich the young man thought preserable to his promised reatness. Being sent for to appear before Cosmo and the Bognese deputies, the latter no sooner saw him than they reognized and almost adored him; but still the youth seemed be backward as to the proposal. At last, Cosmo taking him lide, talked to him, according to Muchiavel , in the folwing terms. "None can in this case advise thee better than thyself, for thou art to make that choice which thou findest thy own soul inclinable to; and if thou be the son ' of Hercules Bentiveglio, thou wilt dispose thyself to actions worthy that house and family; but if thou be the son of * Agnola Cascese, thou wilt content thyself to stay in Florence, and follow his mean trade of dreffing wool." Those words apused the youth to ambition. He resigned himself entirely wCosmo and Capponi, who persuaded the Florentines to furnish m with dress and equipages suiting the station to which he via called; and he fet out for Bologna, where he received charge of the Bentivoglio family, which he managed with brunch prudence, that he lived with honour, and died in Pice; a happiness denied to his ancestors.

The duke of Milan, after Picinina's death, being at a loss Ciarpelina a general to command his troops, treated with Ciarpellone lone put to be dire-mentioned, to whom he had given some possessions in death. The Milanese. Sforza had some notice of the negotiation; when Ciarpellone applied for leave to repair to the Milanese, Sforza laid him under arrest, and then put him to death. The incident was far from being displeasing to the Florentines, who were apprehensive of nothing more than they were of the good understanding between Sforza and the duke of Milanese who hearing the cause of Ciarpellone's death, resolved to came to be a considerable prince. Brachio's birth was noble, as were his actions, in which he rivalled Sforza; but he died as a mercenary, and the same rivalship which had subsisted between the first Sforza and Brachio, descended to the second Sforza and Picinino, the companion and inheritor of Brachio's fortunes. It is however evident, that the genius of the younger Sforza had the ascendant over that of Picinino, who was a brave and an able commander, but desective in judgment every where but in action.

Ibid. book vi.

A peace eg uluded.

UPON the death of Picinino, and the defeat of his forces, the pope, not daring to trust to the king of Naples, employed the Florentines to mediate a peace for him with Sforza; in which they succeeded, and by it Oscimo, Recanuti, and Fabriano, a village equal to most cities, were yielded to the pope, and Sforza was continued in all his other possessions in the marquifate of Ancona: and thus the peace of Italy seemed to be for some time secured, when it was again disturbed by the Bolognese. Annibal Bentivoglio, who had driven Picinim. out of Bologna, had formed a league between the Bolognese, the Florentines, and Venetians, at which the duke of Milan was secretly uneasy. Battista Canneschi, the head of a powerful family in the Bolognese, and in alliance, but not in friendship, with that of Bentivoglio, knew that the duke of Milan's great ambition was to become master of that city; and Battista engaged to put him in possession of it, by dispatching. his rival Bentivoglio, which he actually did on the twentyfourth of June, 1445. He had been promised to be supported by the duke of Milan; and the Venetian and Florenting. deputies then refiding at Bologna, not knowing how far the conspiracy might extend, confined themselves to their own The Bolognese, however, in general detesting the assassination of Bentivoglio, ran to arms, defeated the Conneschi family and party, drove them out of the city, and dragging Battiffa from a corn-chest where he had concealed himself, put him to death, no succours from the duke of Milan having appeared. The Bolognesse were now at a loss for a head. They adored the Bentivoglio family; but Annibal had left behind him only a fon of fix years old, and his relation began to quarrel amongst themselves about the government of The count of Poppi, whom we have already menthe city. tioned, was then at Bologna; and, perceiving how the city was divided, he intimated to fome of the leading men, that he could furnish them with a descendant from Annibal Bestin voglio, who could head them. Upon enquiry, he affirmed that Hercules, the fon of Annibal, happening about twenty years before to be at Poppi, had begot a fon called Santi,

Affairs of Bologna.

whose countenance resembled Hercules so much, that it was a sufficient proof of his original. He added, that Hercules had always acknowledged him to be his, though the mother, who was married, had educated him as the son of her husband, who was now dead, and whose name was Agnolo Cascife. The Bolognese, eagerly attached to the Bentivoglio samily, eagerly embraced the proposal, and fent deputies to the Florentines, in whose possession the count's estates were, to lend the young man, who was now about twenty years of age, to take upon him the administration of their affairs. The matter was referred to Cosmo de Medici, and Neri di Capponi; but they proceeded cautiously. The youth was then living with his reputed uncle Antonio Cascese, who being rich. and childless, intended to make him his heir; a prospect which the young man thought preserable to his promised greatness. Being sent for to appear before Cosmo and the Bolognefe deputies, the latter no sooner saw him than they recognized and almost adored him; but still the youth seemed to be backward as to the proposal. At last, Cosmo taking him alide, talked to him, according to Muchiavel', in the following terms. "None can in this case advise thee better "than thyself, for thou art to make that choice which thou "findest thy own soul inclinable to; and if thou be the son " of Hercules Bentiveglio, thou wilt dispose thyself to actions "worthy that house and family; but if thou be the fon of " Agnolo Cascese, thou wilt content thyself to stay in Florence, "and follow his mean trade of dressing wool." Those words aroused the youth to ambition. He resigned himself entirely to Cosmo and Capponi, who persuaded the Florentines to furnish him with dress and equipages suiting the station to which he was called; and he fet out for Bologna, where he received the charge of the Bentivoglio family, which he managed with 6 much prudence, that he lived with honour, and died in peace; a happiness denied to his ancestors.

THE duke of Milan, after Picinino's death, being at a loss Ciarpelfor a general to command his troops, treated with Ciarpellone lone put to before-mentioned, to whom he had given some possessions in death. the Milanese. Sforza had some notice of the negotiation; and when Ciarpellone applied for leave to repair to the Mila-Me, Sforza laid him under arrest, and then put him to death. This incident was far from being displeasing to the Florentines, who were apprehensive of nothing more than they were of the good understanding between Sforza and the duke of Milan, who hearing the cause of Ciarpellone's death, resolved to be revenged upon Sforza, whole fon-in-law was Gifmond Malatesta lord of Rimini.

The duke of Milan applies to Naples.

THIS Gismand had pretentions upon Pesare and Urbine; the first of which Sforza gave to his brother Alexander, and the other to Frederick of Montefeltro, Gismond's professed enethe king of my. The duke of Milan fided with Gifmond, and brought the pope and the king of Naples over to the fame party: Ancona thereby became the feat of war; and the Florenting and Venetians layouring Sforza, he seized upon all Gismond's estates. On the other hand, the duke attempted to take from Sforza, Cramona and Pontremoli; but failed in both undertakings: the latter being defended by the Florentines, and the former by the Venetians. Francis Picinino was then general of the duke of Milun's army; but was totally defeated at Gafal by Michalotti the Venetian general. The duke being then blind, aged, and infirm, the Venetians pushed their conquests beyond the Adda to the very gates of Milan. Upon this the duke applied for affishance to the king of Naples, who could fend him no troops without their fighting their way through the Florentine territories, and those of Sforza.

Sforza joins the duke of Milan.

Ŀ.

THE reader is not to imagine, amidst all those complications of affairs, either enmity or friendship had the smallest share. Both of them were produced by interest; and the balance of power in Italy, was the great aim for which all parties either negotiated or fought. No fooner were the Voutians victorious, than Sforza grew jealous of their greatnes, and began to liften to terms with his father-in-law, who, in the most moving manner, folicited his friendship. Sforss was the more disposed to this, as he perceived the Venetions began now to trust to their own power, and were slow in supplying him with money. The Florentines, from the like motives, were equally backward; but it must be acknowledged that Sforza on this, and indeed on most other occasions, behaved like an able politician. He knew that the great aim of the Venetians was to deprive him of his succession to Milan; but, though the duke offered to make him general of all his forces, provided he would leave the service of Venice, and compromise affairs with the pope, he kept himself unde-The Venetians, sensible how extremely advantageous the duke's offers were to Sforza, reminded him of the obligations he lay under to them for preserving Cremona, and promised to him. Milan if they should conquer it, together with the perpetual command of their armies, if he would continue the war and obstruct the march of the Neapellum forces to Lombardy. Sforza, after long deliberation on a choice fo difficult in its own nature to determine, thought that the Venetian offers were too extravagant to be fincere; and that, if he was successful, he must take the law from them. He therefore hefitated upon his answer; and the Venetians, asraid that he would determine himself in favour of the duke, attempted to surprise Cremona, but were baffled by Sforza's garrison; upon which he immediately resolved to take part with his father-in-law.

SFORZA at that time lay at Cotignola, and was preparing to march to his father-in-law's affiftance when he heard of his death, which happened on the last day of August, who dies. This news threw him into infinite perplexities. Through the backwardness of the Venetians, he was greatly in arrears to his troops, who he was afraid would mutiny. He could not trust to the Florentines, whom he knew to be arially allied with the Fenetians, now his declared enemies. He could expe I little affistance from the reigning pope, who was Nicholas V. because he was in possession of great part of the church's patrimony; and the king of Naples had always professed himself to be his implacable adversary. He therefore wifely resolved to depend on his own courage and fortune. He instantly marched into the Bolognese, passed by Modena and Reggio, and offered his service to the Milanese to defend them against the Venetians. The state of Milan was then Sforza's greatly divided. Some were for converting their government difficulties. into a republic, resembling that of Figurence; some were for Submitting to Alphonfo, king of Naples; and some for receiving Sforza for their master; while others inclined to the Venetians. Those differences were not unfavourable to Sforza's views: he repaired to Cremona, and there he received deputies from the Milanese, who offered to make him general of their troops upon the terms he had concluded with the late duke, and to give him Brescia and Verona, as soon as he could conquer the latter. Pope Nicholas, upon his accession to the popedom, with a view of making a general peace in Italy, had proposed to the Florentine deputies a congress at Ferrara, to which all the princes and states of Italy should send plenipotentiaries. This was agreed to by the Florentines, and their ambaffadors, with those from Venice and Milan; repaired to it; but the king of Naples flood out. He had advanced as far as Tivoli to the assistance of the late duke, and threatened to force his way through the Florentine territories. Notwithstanding this, the tengress at Ferrara still went on; and, after many debates, it A congress was agreed, that the duke of Milan should make his choice as Ferrara. either of a perpetual peace, or a truce for five years; but the deputies, who were to carry him the option, found him dead.

NOTWITHSTANDING this, the regency of Milan would Divitions imongst the have stood to the agreement; but Lodi and Piacenza, two Milanele. places of great importance, having submitted to the Venetians after the duke's death, the latter thought that all the Milanest would follow their example, and that they either would force or persuade the rest of the late duke's subjects to submit to They were the more encouraged in this, because the Florentines, whom they knew to be extremely jealous of the ballance of power in Italy, had at this time sufficient employment in opposing Alphonso's passage through their state. He Progress of had already made himself master, by a conspiracy, of the Alphonio. castle of Gennima, in the upper vale of Arno; which alarmed the Florentines so much, that they immediately appointed their ten field-deputies, and made preparations for war with for much vigour, that Alphonso marched into the Siennese, in hopes to bring that city to join him. The inhabitants, however, were so faithful to their attachments to Florence, that all he could obtain from them was some provision for his army, which they durst not refuse him. By this time the Florentines had an army on foot, and had retaken Cennima. Alphonso, upon that, took several forts in the Volterran; and som > fo that, after throwing garrisons into the places he had taken, he went into winter-quarters in the Siennese.

Frederic lord of Urbins, and Gismond Malatesta; and some differences, that subsisted between them, being reconciled by the prudence of Cappeni and Bernardo de Medici, they not only retook all the towns the Florentines had lost in the territories of Pifa and Volterra, but straitened the Neapolitans in their quarters. Spring coming on, both armies received reinforcements; though that of Alphonio, confisting of fifteen thousand men, was by far the strongest. The Florentines marched to Spadaletto, and the Neapolitans to Campegli; but, turning suddenly off, they besieged Piombino, a place of the utmost Piembino, importance both to Florence and Pifa. This laid the Florence tines under great difficulties: they armed four veffels which they had at Leghern, and fent them to Piombino, with three hundred men on board; while the main body of their army took post at Caldacce, from whence they could harrass the besiegers. While they were in this station, they suffered great. distress for want of provisions, especially wine; while they thence he marched to the Pisan territories, and made himself master of some places, by the favour of the counts of Ghirardesca; but he failed in his design upon Campegli, the winter being far advanced, and the place making a strong resistance;

HE was no sooner retired than the Florentines took the field, in the depth of a most bitter winter. Their generals were perceived that their enemy's army had plenty of every thing prought them by sea. They attempted to supply themselves n the same manner; but their ships were intercepted by Albonfo's gallies, and two of them taken, while the others were obliged to put back. This disappointment raised a kind of mutiny in the Florentine army, so that many of them deserted to Alphonio; and even those that remained refused to serve onger in a place where they were exposed to parching heats, without either wine or wholfome water to drink. This obliged the generals to move their camp. But Alphonso's army, tho' plentifully supplied with provisions, began now to be infected with pestilential diseases, and a treaty of peace was set on The terms demanded by Alphanso were, that he should be paid fifty thousand ducats for the expence of the war, and be put in possession of Piombino. The Florentines were so tired of the war, that they were inclinable to have accepted of those terms; when Capponi, arriving at the army, persuaded them to reject them, and to indemnify the lord of Piombino for the vigorous defence the place had made, which the Florentines unanimously agreed to do. When Alphonso heard of this resolution, he found himself under the necessity of shamefully raising the siege, after losing two thousand men before which is the place; and he retreated first to Sienna, and from thence raised. to his own country, menacing to return next fpring, and to be revenged for the affronts and injuries he had received. In the mean while, Sforza brought over to his views young Picinino; and taking the field, he marched against Pavia. The Progress of inhabitants were in no condition to relist him; but had a Sforza. strong aversion to the Milanese government, and therefore offered to give up their city to Sforza, provided he did not subject them to the Milanele. He would gladly have embraced their offer, and have performed the condition; but he had some measures still to keep with the Milanese; and a new power, that of the duke of Savey, now started up in Italy, and threatened an alteration in her political system. By accepting of the government of Pavia, he was afraid of exasperating the Milanefe, so as to make them throw themselves under the protection or government of the Venetians; and it he did not accept of it, there was a party within the place ready to give it up to the duke of Savey. He thought, however, the consequence of accepting was preserable to that of refuling it. He accordingly took possession of Pavia, for which he apologized to the Milanese by urging, that it was much safer for them that he should have it, than either the Venetians or the duke of Savey. This excuse would not have satisfied the Milanese, had they not been beset with other disficulties, ficulties, and fecretly deteffed the Venetians. They feemed therefore to take all that Sforza had done in good part, and he continued to head their troops.

CHARLES of Orleans, nephew to the late duke of Milan by his fifter, was a pretender, in right of blood, to that dutchy, and he was abetted by the duke of Savey and the Genoese; but his pretentions were soon quieted by Sforza, who was employed against him: while the Venetians, supported by a strong party amongst the Milanese themselves, carried on the war with great advantage, being still masters of Lodi and Piacenza. Sforza, with great difficulty, retook Piacenza; and had the Venetians been willing to have given up Lodi, a peace must have ensued: so much did they smart under the burden of the war, and so jealous they were of their general, whom they were obliged to trust. They fent him orders to beliege Caravaggio, which, against his inclination, he obeyed; and the Venetians, in attempting to raise the siege, received the greatest defeat they had ever sustained, not above one thousand of their horse, out of twelve thousand, escaping. After this, Sforza, who, according to Machiavel , behaved with great magnanimity, marched into the Brestian territory, within two miles of that city.

The Florentines afift the Venetians.

THE Venetians, after their defeat at Caravaggio, and collecting the broken remains of their troops, perceived that their furest resource lay in the Florentines. All they aimed at, was to be in a condition to make a tolerable peace; which they soon effected by the fresh levies they made, and the affistance of two thousand horse and one thousand foot sent them by the Florentines, who were now unmolested by Alphonso. view was to make a separate peace with Sforza, to render him the more odious to the Milanefe. Sforza, on the other hand, knowing on what terms he stood with the latter, readily came of into the proposal. A treaty was concluded, by which Sforza agreed to return to the Venetians all the plunder, prisoners, and places, that had been taken from them in the course of the war; while they were to affift him with twenty-five thoufand florins a month, four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, till he had conquered Milan. The news of this treity arriving at that city, reduced the Milanese to such delpair, that they sent ambassadors, not to treat with Sforza, but to revile and upbraid him with his conduct. This they did in the most bitter manner, denouncing the heaviest imprecations upon him and his posterity for his treachery and ingratitude towards their state. Sforza heard them without any apparent motion, and recriminated upon them the charge of ingratiude, appealing to heaven for the rectitude of his conduct.

* MACHIAVEL, book vi.

The deputies leaving him, Sforza immediately advanced with is army to Milan, which was defended by the inhabitants nder Francis and Jacob, the two fons of Picinino, from their iereditary hatred to Sforza. The Milanese hoped to desend hemselves till Sforza and the Venetians should quarrel, an event by no means improbable. Sforza, on the other hand, o keep the Venetians firm to his interest, relinquished to them he fine city of Crema, situated on the river Serebio in the Cremasco, if they could conquer it; and having subdued all the Milanese to the gates of that capital, he formally besieged

THE inhabitants, finding that they must submit, made an A peace. attempt upon the humanity of the Venetians, whom they conjured, by all the bonds of liberty and ancient friendship, not to give them up to a tyrant, whose ambition was insatiable, and which, if successful, would prove a scourge to Venice itfelf. The Venetians were then pressing the siege of Grema, which they resolved to make themselves masters of before they gave the Milancse an explicit answer. They however privately promised them affistance; and having taken Crema, while Sforza's foldiers were plundering the suburbs of Milan, they then openly declared their intention to make peace with the Milanese, which they soon did, by promising to desend Milan in the possession of its newly acquired liberty. They next intimated the peace they had made to Sforza, and ordered their troops under him to withdraw from his army, allowing him twenty days to come to a resolution upon his being included in the peace, or not. Sforza, though he had long foreseen it, was shocked at this agreement. He kept the Venetian deputies for two days about his person, without returning them any answer; but at last he pretended a readiness to accede to the peace, and nominated ambassadors to repair to Milan, and ratify it. He gave them, however, secret instructions to raise quibbles and difficulties, in order to gain time, and not to ratily it at all. We are now to return to the affairs of Florence. which, in the subsequent part of the history, could not have been understood, without relating what had happened in Lom-

THOUGH Florence at this time was neutral in the disputes between the Venetians and the Milanese, yet it was the sequence great intrigue and action. The Turks were then so powerful, that they threatened the extinction of the Greek empire; the head of which, John Paleologus, had promised to submit to the Latin church, provided the western powers would assist him against the infidels. Though this offer was highly against the sentiments both of his clergy and his people, yet the glory of converting a Greek emperor was too important a eircumstance for the pope to disregard. The council of Basil, who declared itself superior to the pope, had voted money and ships for bringing the emperor over to that city, where they intended to fettle the reconciliation. The pope was then at Florence; but he had his emissaries at Basil, who surreptitiously voted, that the emperor should be received at Florence or Ferrara, to which last city the pope had adjourned the as-They even broke open the box where the feals of the council lay, and affixed them to this impudent forgery, which they had reduced into the form of a decree. pope's gallies, being ready before those of the council, repaired to Constantinople, with money sufficient for the expences of the emperor; and there they took him on board, with his patriarch, and a few of his clergy, who were willing, for conveniency, to follow his example. The pope received them at Arrival of Ferrara, where, after a few ridiculous disputes, they were rethe Greek conciled to the Roman church; but neither the emperor nor emperor in his clergy kissed the toe of his holiness, or in the least descended from the dignity of their characters.

mid

A. D.

1439.

Italy.

FROM Ferrara the pope adjourned the council to Florence. as being a nobler scene for his triumph, and there the reconciliation was to be fully and finally completed. According to Aretin b, no fewer than five hundred Greeks were then at Florence; amongst whom, besides the emperor and the patriarch, were the emperor's brother, many archbishops and bishops, and other persons of the highest distinction and learning. Every thing succeeded as the pope, who was a man of great temper as well as abilities, proposed. The Greek ecclesiastics embraced the opinion of purgatory; and the emperor, the patriarch, and the other prelates, subscribed to the supremacy of the Ronan church.

Disputes betaveen Colmo and Capponi.

SCARCELY was this great transaction finished, when the state of affairs in Lombardy fell under the consideration of the : Florentines, and revived the factions in their city. The temporizing conduct of Sforza, who made a truce for a month with the Milanese, and had withdrawn his troops, deceived both them and the Venetians. The former, no longer oppressed by his army, grew indolent and unguarded; and the Venetians, thinking peace as good as concluded, gave over all preparations for continuing the war. Sforza improved this breathing time to his own purpoles. During it, he recruited and refreshed his army, and applied to the Florentines for affishance. His chief reliance was on Cosmo de Medici, who had always proved himself his friend, and in his greatest dissipation proposed to the magistracy that Sforza should be supported, he met with great opposition. Neri di Capponi was at the head of a powerful party, who declared for affishing the Milanese to the utmost in preserving their liberty; and that it was for the interest of Florence that Italy should be divided into as many small states as possible. They added, that, if either Sforza or the Venetians should acquire the mastery of Milan, Florence would then have too powerful a neighbour; but that, separately, each might be a useful ally.

COSMO's party thought that Capponi urged those reafons, however specious and indeed solid they might be, against Sforza, only because he was Cosmo's friend. This rendered the latter more vigorous in defence of his opinion: he urged, that the Milanese were so over-run with saction, and were so impersect in their ideas of civil government, that, if lest to themselves, they would soon forset their liberty; and that Sforza was an ally far preferable to the Venetians; that it was more probable that Milan would yield to him than to the Venetians, because he had within it a strong party, and they none; and that the Florentines, by their indecision, might forset his favour.

THOSE debates, managed by two citizens of such eminence and abilities as Cosmo and Capponi were, kept Florence for some time in suspence; and at last the magistracy came to a resolution, savouring of the policy of the times, which was to fend deputies to Sforza, who, if they found him powerful and prevalent, were to agree to grant him all his demands; if otherwise, to accuse him with delays and difficulties. But by this time, both Sforza and the Venetians had taken the field. Though it was still winter, the Venetians had advanced to the banks of the Adda; from whence they sent agents to Milan, with mighty promises of success against Sforza, if the inhabitants could be prevailed upon to hold out for a little time. The eldest Picining was now dead, and the command of the Milanese garrison devolved upon his brother Jacob; and, during the winter, Sforza had several skirmishes with the Venetians, who were hated by Pandolfo Mulatesta. After many deliberations, whether Milan should be relieved by hazarding a battle, or by the Venetians keeping the posts where they were, by which they greatly straitened Sforza's army, now in want of forage and provisions, Pandolfo's opinion prevailed for the latter; and the rather, because the greater the necessities to which which the Milanese were driven, they would the more readily submit to the Fenetians.

Siege of Milan.

Bur necessity, on this occasion, cut asunder the lines of policy. In proportion as Sforza himself was straitened, he straitened the inhabitants of Milan, till multitudes died of mere want in their streets, and discontent and murmurs filled the whole city. Two persons, who had entered into a difcourse about the public miseries, being overheard by other who joined them, as they were by others, till the company grew great, and their clamours outrageous. They then chole one Jasper of Vicomeriato for their leader, broke into the palace of their magistrates, where they put to death all who did not fave themselves by flight, and tore in pieces Leonard Vinetto, the Venetian ambassador, whom they looked upon as the main spring of all their miseries. They next began to confider how they were to proceed. Some were for submitting to the French king, some to the king of Naples, and fome to the duke of Saviy; but so inveterate they were against Sforza, that none mentioned him. At last Jasper, who had gained great authority over the affembly, finding them irreconcileably undetermined amongst themselves, proposed Sforza to be the master of Milan. He proved to his fellow citizens that their present condition was such, that it could admit of no uncertainties or delays; that though Sforza had been their enemy, yet he was a brave man, and the most likely person in the world to protect them; and that he had been forced by the falshood and injustice of the Venetians, and the other states of Italy, to do all that he had done against them. In short, that as it was now evident they must part with their liberty, they could not chuse a better master. This speech was received with wonderful applause, and the assembly were more unanimous in making Sforza their master, than they had been in declaring him their enemy. Jasper was then fent their ambassador to give him the invitation; and Milan, on the 26th of February, 1450, with the utmost joy and magnificence, received Sforza as its master.

State of Italy.

This news reaching Florence, couriers were dispatched after the deputies, now on their road to Sforza's camp, with orders not to treat with him, but to congratulate him upon his accession to the sovereignty of Milan. Sforza received the Florentine ambassadors with demonstrations of the most cordial friendship, as coming from the only people in Italy on whom he could rely as his natural allies. Thus Italy was divided into two parties; the one consisting of the Neapolitans and the Venetians, and the other of the Florentines and the Milanese. Alphonso and the Venetians entered into a formal league, by which was agreed, that he should fall upon the Florentines, r upon the Milanese. To give some colour of justice receding, both Alphonso and the Venetians, who had still sublisting with the Florentines, sent ambassadors nee to declare that their league was purely desensive; the Venetians entered complaints which they thought stify their acting offensively. They accused the Floss having given passage to Alexander, Sforza's, brother troops into Lombardy; and that they had been the Sforza's reconciliation with the marquis of Mantaa.

MO de Medici was, by the Florentine senate or ma- Alliances appointed to answer their complaints. He did this between ig the Venetian ambassadors in mind of the vast acqui-the Florenpower and territory their republic had made by the tines and of Florence; that the matters they complained of Sforza. re trifles, and that, in all events, the Venetians might enmity as prejudicial to then, as their friendship ed advantageous. With this answer the ambassadors ; but Sforza and the Florentines knowing their own entered into fresh engagements with each other, and for the worst. The engagements between Alphonso Tenetians foon began to unfold themselves, by all the of Florence being banished, without any reason given. e territories of Naples and Venice. Immediately after Venetians collected together all the exiles of Bologna, Il continued to be governed by Santi Bentivoglio, the d of the Florentines. Their design was to introduce es, and a body of troops by the common fewers, in ey succeeded so far, that they never were discovered were in the heart of the city. Santi was awakened s fleep with an alarm that the rebels were in possesologna. He was advised to save himself by flight, as was thought to be irrecoverably lost; but he bravely danger, put himself at the head of his friends and affectioned citizens, deseated the conspirators, drove t of the city, and by his valour fully proved himfelf he Bentivoglio blood.

the deputies good words. Alphonfo, who by this time ferrely thought the Venetians were becoming too powerful, invented excuses for having banished the Florentines out of his dominions, and offered paisports to all those who chose to return: but, notwithstanding this fair language, the deputies could easily see that he harboured resentment in his heart against The Venetians, who in reality at that juncture their country. aspired to the sovereignty of all Lombardy, excused themselves, on account of their engagements with Alphonso, from admitting the Florentine deputies into their territories; and they went so far in their enmity to the Florentines, as to solicit the emperor of Constantinople to prohibit their trading in his dominions; but he rejected their request. The Siennese gave the Florentine deputies a courteous reception, because their allies were not yet prepared to support them.

The implacable spirit the Venetians discovered against the France and Florentines, served but to strengthen the connections of the the Gelatter with Sforza, who brought the Genoese into their allinosese join ance, and compromised all ancient differences between them the Florentines. Soon after, the French king became a party in the same league; and his accession to it was proclaimed by the Florentines and their allies with great pomp, throughout all their dominions.

The emperor comes to Italy.

THE Florentines, thus encouraged and strengthened, refused to admit the Venctian ambassadors into Florence, where they intended, in conjunction with Alphonso's minister, to justify the conduct of their respective masters; and Alphons's ambassador resused to go by himself. In the mean time frederick III. emperor of Germany, arrived in Italy. His busines there was to receive the crown of Lombardy from the pope, and to meet Eleanora, the daughter of the king of Portugal, who had been espoused to him in marriage, and who arriving at Pisa was conducted to Sienna. As to the emperor himself, various are the reports concerning his journey. Some fay he was fo poorly attended, that he was attacked and robbed by the banditti, and scarcely escaped with his life; while others pretend 2 that he travelled with great magnificence. The latter is most probable, as Machiavel b tells us, that on the 30th of January, 1451, he entered Florence, attended by four hundred horse, and stayed till the 6th of February, receiving from the fenate all the honours due to his high station. We know of me particular affairs he transacted in Florence. Sforza's establishment in Milan was but yet new, nor was he well affected " the emperor; so that the latter durst not venture to repair

² Heiss's Hist. of Germany. ^b Machiavel, book vi.

S. Mila,

Milan, to receive what is called the iron crown, by which the Germanic emperors were crowned kings of Lombard. The pope however crowned him at Rome; and in the following May he and his empress returned to Florence, where he was received with the fame honours as before; and during this journey, he made Borsi d'Este, marquis of Ferrara, duke of Modena and Reggio, as a reward for his services in persuading the people to grant him the tutelage of young Ladiflaus, king of Bohemia.

Most of this year, and the beginning of 1452, was spent by the Florentines, as well as the Venetians and the other powers concerned, in forming alliances, or making preparations Success of for the ensuing war. In the month of May the Venetians, and Sforza. their ally the marquis of Montferrat, entered the Milanese at the same time; the former with fourteen thousand horse and fix thousand foot by the way of Lodi, and the latter by that of Alessandria. Sforza was not wanting to himself: his army confished of eighteen thousand horse and three thousand foot; and having thrown strong garrisons into Alessandria and Lodi, he carried the war into the enemies country by destroying Brefdano, and taking many inconfiderable places, tho' without brming any important siege: but the marquis of Montferrat was defeated near Alessandria by Sforza's troops.

ABOUT the time that the war in Lombardy was renewed, The Neathe Neapolitans invaded Tuscany with twelve thousand men, politans commanded by Ferdinand, eldeft fon to Alphonfo, and Frede-invade rick of Urbino. Machiavel egives us the most contemptible Tuscany, idea of this expedition. The operations of the invaders began but are by the siege of Foiana (perhaps the modern Focognano) in the vale of Chiana; the only defence of which was a pitiful castle and a very weak wall, the whole garrifon being no more than two hundred men. Ferdinand, favoured by the Siennese, through whose country he marched, besieged this place with all his army, thirty-fix days before he could take it. The Florentines made use of this time to strengthen their garrisons and reinforce their army, whilst the Neapolitans marched farther into the vale of Chiana, where they were baffled in all the lieges they attempted before castles and towns, which in the days of Machiavel were, for their weakness, deemed to be untenable, and therefore flighted. The Florentines at that time had on foot an army of eight thousand men, under Asterra of Faenza and Gismond Malatesta; but perceiving their enemies to be so aukward and unexperienced in the field, they kept upon the defensive, knowing well that their chief towns were in no danger, and that their enemies must waste felves in their idle attempts. Ferdinand at last laid sie Castelna, which lies in the vale of Chiana, within ten of Sienna; but though it was a very inconsiderable pla art and nature, he was obliged, after laying forty-six da fore it, shamefully to abandon the siege. Ferdinand, ever, all this time sent out parties, which scoured the country within six miles of Florence, but were unable t the smallest town.

A. D.

MACHIAVEL, book vi.

WHILE the fiege of Castelma was carrying on, the I litans had brought up a squadron of about twenty gallie rying some land troops, which lay off Pifa, and surprize town of Vada in the Volterran, fituated at the mouth river Cecina, from whence they annoyed the neighb country; but they were foon confined within their wal ships by some troops which the Florentines sent against The inactivity of this campaign is some proof that A was irrefolute as to the part he had to act, and that h loufy of the Venetians encreased. Hitherto the Flor. feemed rather to sport with, than to be terrified by his but in the fpring of the year 1453, they thought high time to retake the places they had loft. Being rein with two hundred horse under Alexander Sforza, brot the duke of Milan, they belieged and retook Foiano, an fome difficulty re-peopled it, having been abandoned former inhabitants. The town of Vada was likewise reby the Florentines, after being fet fire to and deserted Neapolitahs, who now behaved like robbers rather the diers, sublisting by plunder and violence, without da face their enemies in the field.

Their at-THEIR fovereign Alphonso perceiving how little he tempt upon from the Florentines by force of arms, now tried that of r the vale of The vale of Bagno had been subjected to the Florentine. Bagno dif- years, and the lord of it, Gerardo Garribatorti, had appointed. ferved in their armies. His castle, which was called Go and estate, lay convenient for making incursions into t fantin and the valley of Tevere; and Alphonfo tampere him to give them up to him in exchange for an estate kingdom of Naples, to which Gerardo agreed. The. tines had fome intimation of the negotiation, and fent senger, who taxed Gerardo with it; but he not only so disclaimed it, but, pretending that he himself was indi fent his son to Florence as a pledge of his fidelity, of the Florentines seemed now to be quite satisfied. In the while the bargain being finished between Alphonso and G the former fent one Puccio, a knight of Ferusalem, with sops, who took possession of all the vale of Bagno, exceptg the castle of Corzano, greatly against the inclination of

e inhabitants. A brave young Pisan, one Antonio Gualandi, with Gerardo when Puccio came to take possession of the stle; and Gerardo going to the gate to admit him, Antonio, to detected his treachery, thrust him out of the gate, which locked, and took upon himself the command of the garn, who declared for the Florentines. The news of this rited well-timed action slying abroad, the people of Bagno
i the courage to take up arms under the Florentine standards, i drove the Neapolitans out of their country; Gerardo himescaped with difficulty, but less his wise, family, and esh, in the hands of the Florentines, who imprisoned his the hostage, and sent troops into the country, who took session of all Gerardo's estate.

THE pope was too wife a man, and too intent upon secur- Aconspiraa or rather regaining, his own power at Rome, to concern cy against. melf in the wars either of Tuscany or Lombardy. His domi- the pope un, and that of his clergy, was at that time detested by the diffeated. man; and a hair-brained enthusiast had almost expelled mout of Rome. His name was Stephen Porcari, a man of mily and learning; but his head being turned by reading tt, especially Petrarch, whom he believed to be divinely ired, and that in one of his sonnets he had pointed him out the deliverer of Italy, he began to affect many particularities his living and dress, which coming to the pope's ears, made a conclude that the man's brain was affected, and therefore committed him to the custody of the governor of Bologna, tunder strict confinement, but with orders that no day uld pass without Stephen appearing before him. This reant served but to render Stephen the more expeditious and duous in his great design. He often went and returned from ena to Rome, where he concerted matters with his friends fuch expedition, that the governor always faw him once by; till, thinking his defign was ripe for execution, he ted all the heads of them to a supper at Rome, and appearamongst them in a most sumptuous habit, he laid down plan for executing the conspiracy next day, by seizing the al palace, calling the people to arms, and delivering rom the tyranny of the pope and his ecclefiaftics. The mbly, however, were in the mean while in the papal i; all of them were that very night seized, and Stephen, the principal conspirators, put to death.

The Alphonso's invasion of Tuscany had done no great Regnier of age to the Florentines, yet it had obliged them to keep up Anjou may at a great expense, of which they sought to ease comes to U3 them-Italy.

themselves. For this purpose they sent Agnolo Acciato their ambassador to the court of France, to engage Re commonly called René of Anjou, who, as we have feen a great claim upon the crown of Naples, to come to and affert the same by joining the Florentines and the Milan. Regnier listened to the proposal; and it was a that the Florentines should pay him thirty thousand floring money, and ten thousand florins a month, upon his 'er Lombardy at the head of two thousand four hundred against the Venetians: but when Regnier was ready to 1 the duke of Savoy and the marquis of Montferrat, allies Venetians, gave him to understand, that if he proceeds would oppose his passage, which Regnier was in no co to force. Upon this, by Acciaivolo's advice, he put his troops on board transports which carried them to Lon and the king of France dealt so effectually with the Savoy, that the rest went by land. Regnier, who not upon himself the title of king of Naples, was receive great marks of respect by Sforza, and the French and A troops joining, they recovered from the Venetians all th had taken in the Cremonese, with a great part of the Br and obliged the Venetian army to retire under the w Brescia itself. The winter then coming on, both went into quarters.

and returns.

BEFORE the spring the politics of the court of Fran an unexpected turn; and when the duke of Milan p to take the field, and to finish the conquest of the Br Regnier, who had wintered at Piacenza, informed th that he was obliged to return to France; nor could ! personal application and intreaties detain him. Regnier had been drawn into Italy by the Florentines, any intention to serve the duke of Milan (to whose do another prince of the blood royal of France laid claim) than as he was connected with the Florentines. The la the other hand, never had any defign of aggrandizing farther than was confistent with the ballance of pow wished to maintain in Italy, which they thought had beer ently established by his late successes. They were the under no concern at Regnier's departure, especially as the nothing now to apprehend from Alphonfo. All that: could be prevailed on to do, was to leave part of his in Lombardy, and to promise to send his son John to co in his place. This young prince accordingly came t bardy, but he resided at Florence, where he met s honourable reception.

THE system of public power all over Christendom, but in The recon-Italy especially, now received a great alteration. The Greek ciliation of empire was little benefited by its emperor and patriarch sub. the Greek mitting to the supremacy of the western church. This sub- with the mission was so hateful at Constantinople, that it was there com- Latin monly faid, that they had rather see in their churches a tur- church. ban than a cardinal's hat. The emperor however, still hoping to be affifted by the western princes, conformed to the Roman ritual, and was publickly attended by Isidore a Roman cardinal, But all the affiftance he received from Italy confifted of four Genoese ships, one of which was surnished by the emperor Frederick III. fo that the great city of Constantinople fell into the hands of the infidels, and the emperor lost his life in defending it.

THE princes and states of Italy could not with indifference fee fuch an accession of power to the Othmans. Constantimaple was then reckoned the first city in the world, and the infidels were strong enough at sea fully to avail themselves of all the advantages of its situation. Their fleets had already made great depredations on the subjects of the pope and Venice, and it was every day expected they would invade Italy. The pope was incessantly exhorting the Italian princes and flates to reflect upon their own danger; and indeed the state of their affairs favoured his admonitions. The duke of Milan being deprived of the affistance of France, sought to apply himself to the regulation of his own dominions. Venetians had more than any other power to fear from the Turks. The Florentines had attained all they aimed at; and though Alphonso still held out, yet it was plain that he must yield at last. At the pope's earnest request, all the powers at war sent their ministers to a congress at Rome. Great altercations happened between the duke of Milan and the Venetians; the former infifted upon their giving up to him Bergamo, Brescia, and Crema, and they, that he should yield to them Those differences which were thought insuperable at Rome, were accommodated in Lombardy. On the 9th of A peace April, 1454, a peace was concluded between Sforza and the concluded. Venetians, by which each was to be restored to the towns and lands they had possessed before the war, and the duke was left at liberty to recover all that had been taken from him by the duke of Savey, the marquis of Montferrat, or their allies. The pope, the Florentines, the Siennese, and other Tuscan flates, immediately acceded to this treaty, which was followed by a triple alliance, to be in force twenty-five years, between the Florentines, Sforza, and the Venetians. Alphonfo thought himself ill used both by his allies and his enemics, in not being confidered as a principal in this treaty; but his obstinacy was at last overcome by the follicitations of the pope, and by a double marriage of his fon and daughter with these of Sforza; so that he acceded to the peace, reserving however to himself a liberty of making war upon the Genoese, Gismond Malatesta, and Asterra of Faenza. After this he recalled his troops under Ferdinand out of Tuscany.

peius

IT foon appeared that Alphonso was far from being sincerely A. D. disposed to the continuance of the peace. Jucob Picmin, 1455. who was in the Venetian service, was now dismissed from it; and Lombardy, the Romagna, and Tuscany, were filled with officers and foldiers, who had no employment. them, as usual, to affociate amongst themselves; and they chose for their leader Jacob Picinino, who, in right of his father, had many family-claims both in Tuscany and the Romag-Having affembled a small army, which Alphonso prirenews the na. swar. vately affished him in doing, he marched into the Sienus, where he took many strong towns, and threatened Sienna itfelf. Pope Nicholas was now dead, and was succeeded by Calixtus III. a zealous active pontiff, who gave orders to his general, Giovanni Ventimiglia, to join his forces with those of the Florentines, and to march against Picinino. They accordingly engaged him near Bellena, where Ventimiglia was taken prisoner; but Picinino was intirely descated, and fled to Caffiglione, where he must have been obliged to surrender himself prisoner, had he not been supported by Alphonso. As Picinim was considered by the other Italian states to be little better than a free-booter, Alphonfo's abetting him was highly referred ! by them; and that king, to regain their favour, brought Pianing to restore to the Siennese all their towns for twenty though fand florins, and then to retire to Naples.

A crusade

THE progress of the Turks, and the detestation in which published. they were held, bade fair, at this time, to revive the spirit of The pope filled all the Christian crusading in Europe. courts with his nuncios, legates, preachers, and other ministers, to awaken them to a sense of their danger; and they were no where more successful than in Florence. There the chief citizens liberally contributed by their purses, and in their persons, towards an expedition against the insidels; and many of them even wore the fign of the crofs, which had not for many years been feen in Europe, as a proof that they defigned to take upon themselves the crusade. Public procestions were every day feen in their streets, and their pulpit resounded with the merits of the expedition, and the mighty rewards that would attend, in this and the next life, those who should enter into it. This fervour, however, soon came to cool, and at last wholly subsided, upon some slight advantages gained by the Christians over the infidels on the fide of Hungary.

:: : : : :

* m.... :

i., .

FLORENCE was in profound tranquillity in the year A hurri-1456, when, on the 26th of August, Tuscany was visited cane. with one of the most dreadful hurricanes mentioned in history. Castles and churches were unroofed, and the roofs carried to a mile's distance: the most stubborn oaks were torn up by the regts, and toffed about. In other places, houses and churches were levelled to the ground; men and beafts were buried under their ruins, and all the elements seemed conspiring to return to a chaos. Machiavel d however observes, that this hurricane moved in a particular line of direction, and did not affect any of the great cities, where the consequences must have been still much more fatal. But we shall now, after a long interval, return to the internal affairs of Florence.

THAT city and state had been for some years under an State of excellent direction, while Cosmo de Medici and Neri di Cap-Florence. poni acted with unanimity in the public councils. Capponi's services to his country had gained him more friends to his virtue, than followers to his person; while the liberality, the beneficence, and affability of Cosmo, gave him as many fol-lowers as he had friends. The conduct of both in the state was irreproachable, their judgements equal, and each supporting the other, the government was firm and unshaken. Sometimes, it is true, they differed, as in the case of Sforza; but this difference arose from the natural severity of the one. and the opposite character of the other; nor did it proceed to any rancour of party. Cosmo, however, lived long enough to be sensible that he was mistaken in his opinion of Sforza, whose mind was formed more for ambition than friendship. Cosmo had been over lavish in affishing him; and it was owing to him that he was now duke of Milan. In their hours of intimacy together, Cosino had secretly opened his heart to oferza, and told him, that his great ambition was to be the means of putting Lucca one day in the possession of the Florentines; and Sforza solemnly promised to assist him in the attempt as foon as te became master of Milan. This promise greatly influenced Cosmo in supporting Sforza's interest; but the matter for a time was kept private, and when Cosmo called forza, when he was duke of Milan, to perform his engagements, he was answered with forry excuses and affected gelays.

MACHIAVEL, book vi.

Colmo ed by Sforza.

CAPPONI's death occasioned a great abatement of disappoint- Cosmo's interest. Divisions went so far, that it was proposed to discontinue the Balia, or the extraordinary powers, by which the city had been governed under Cosmo and Capponi, and to return to the old method of imborfations, and filling up the chief posts by lot. Secret ambition was at the bottom of this proposal; for many who had all along appeared attached to Cosmo, seeing him now deprived of Capponi's asfistance, and that it was unlikely he should be succeeded by a fon of equal authority and virtue with himself, thought that a proper time to lay the foundations of their own greatness. Cosino perceived their drift; and though he might easily, by force, have feized upon the government, yet he chose to shew them their own infignificancy, by suffering their plan to take place, which it did, especially as he knew that few or none but his own friends would be returned by the imborfations; so that he was safe in all events.

Parties in

THE other party made the experiment, but they foon per-Florence. ceived they had mistaken their measures. Popular elections being restored, put the meanest inhabitant, in that respect, on a footing with the highest. Cosmo's pretended friends, instead of being treated as they had formerly been, with reverence and respect, met now with the most bitter insults and reproaches in all public places, though none of them were returned by the imborfations as persons fit to serve the commonwealth, but those of his party. Cosmo had foreseen this, and the great men who restored the popular system, now faw plainly that, instead of diminishing his authority, they had ruined their own: fo firmly was Cosmo rivetted in the affections of his fellow citizens; but he wifely diffembled all that had happened and his fecret enemies had themselves only to blame.

Cosmo de-

COSMO being now well affured, that no revolution elines pub- of state, or form of government, could affect him, gave lic bufiness. way to the re establishment of the tax catasto, which subiccted all imposts to the law, and not to the discretion of any man, or set of men. This political self-denial had great effects in his favour; for the law being paffed, and the commissioners for executing it appointed, all the great nobility and citizens repaired in a body to Cosmo, intreating him to deliver himself, as well as them, from the tyranny of the people. Cosmo seemed very willing to agree to their request, provided the imposts could be regularly repealed, and a new Balia take place without force, and with the confent of the people. The great men attempted this in vain, and renewed wir applications to Cosmo, who gave them a flat denial; and thus shewed how infignificant the aristocratical power was, while he who was at the head of that aristocracy was upon good terms with the people.

DONATO COCHI was then gonfalonier of justice, and would have gratified the demands of the great citizens, had not the other magistrates, who were intirely in Cosmo's interest, treated him with such taunts and reproaches as drove him mad; and he actually was confined as a lunatic. He was, by the connivance of Cosmo, succeeded by Luca Pitti, who, being bold and enterprising, raised himself upon the diffensions of his country, as we shall have occasion to observe in the course of this history.

WE have already seen, that Alphonso king of Naples, when Alphonso he acceded to the late pacification, reserved to himself a li-renews the berty of carrying on war with certain powers. He employed war. Jacob Picinino, though with little or no success, against Gifmond Malatesta; but he directed the chief force of his kingdom against the Genoese. Fregosa was then doge or duke of Genoa, which was torn into fo many factions within itself, that, despairing to make head against Alphonso, he offered the fovereignty of that republic to Charles king of France. who accepted the offer, and gave the government of the city to John, the son of Regnier of Anjou, Alphonso's rival in the crown of Naples. John accordingly took possession of Genoa, with a view of carrying his arms from thence into Naples. This was an event unforeseen by Alphonso, whose fleet then lay at Capo Fino, where he himself died, leaving his dominions to his fon Ferdinand, who afterwards proved one of the greatest princes of that or any other age. He came to his crown, however, under great difficulties. He was engaged in a doubtful and an unpromising war with the Genoese; and he knew that great numbers of his chief nobility were in: the interest of France. The pope openly pretended, that the kingdom of Naples belonged to the Roman see, and that he intended to annex it to the church's patrimony, and to give the government of it to his nephew, Peter Lodowic Borgia. Surrounded with so many difficulties, Ferdinand had no resource so natural as in Sforza duke of Milan, who knew that the French laid claim to his dominions, and therefore thought it his interest above all things to exclude them from Italy. To him Ferdinand applied, and received from him all kind of encouragement. In the mean while pope Calixtus died, and with him fell all his family's towering projects. He was fucceeded by the famous Eneas Sylvius, a Siennese, of the house of Piccolomini, who took the name of Pius II. and, by h writings, had been a great advocate for the council of Be against the pope; though he afterwards retracted that doctrine. He affected to govern by maxims different from those of his predecessor, who had ventured to lay Ferdinand under escelesiastical censures, and had declared him a bastrad. He disclaimed all thoughts of annexing the kingdom of Naples to the see of Rome, or of savouring the French claim upon that kingdom. He pretended to have no passion but for the good of Christendom and the church; and having bestowed the crown of Naples upon Ferdinand, the latter in return gave his natural daughter in marriage to Antonio, nephew, as he was called, to his holiness, created him prince of Malphi, and restored Benevento and Terracing to the church.

Genoa possessed by John of Anjou.

A. D.

1459.

THE diffentions of Genoa interrupted the internal tranquility of Italy, where every thing again seemed disposed towards a general crusade against the Insidels. John of Anjou was still in possession of that city; but Peter Fregosa, the late doge, who was the cause of his advancement, not thinking his fervices sufficiently repaid, had retired to a castle of his own. where he first broke off all communication with John, and then came to open war with him. Fregola was supported by Ferdinand; and John, having received some reinforcements from France, marched to disposses him of his castle: but Fregola was so well prepared to receive him, that he failed in his attempt, and retired to Genoa. Soon after Fregofa, in the night-time, entered the extensive fortifications of that city, where he made himself master of some posts; but next day, being furrounded by John's troops, he, and almost all his followers, were put to the fword. John, elated with success, in the year 1450 equipped a considerable fleet, with which he made a descent upon the kingdom of Naples, where his party was very strong, and he was received as king by many princes and states.

JOHN king of Arragon, brother to the late king Alphonso, seeing his nephew Ferdinand's crown in danger, sent ambassadors to Florence, requiring them to assist Ferdinand, in terms of their treaty with his sather. To this request the Florentines answered, that they did not conceive themselves obliged to assist the son in a war which had been entailed upon him by the sather, who had begun it without their consent or advice. This resolute answer threw the ambassadors into great perplexities; so that, after entering several protests and instruments, they lest the city in a rage. The truth is, the Florentines thought it more for their interest that Genoa should be in the hands of the French, than in those of the Spaniards.

FERDINAND, the more effectually to oppose John, His promade peace with Gismond Malatesta; upon which Jacob Pi- gress in cining, the sworn enemy of the Malatesta family, left his ser- Naples. vice and entered into that of John, Ferdinand, however, raised a good army, and gave the command of it to Frederick Urbino; but coming to a general engagement near the river Sarno, it was entirely defeated by John, and most of his best officers were taken prisoners. Jacob Picinino advised John instantly to follow his blow, and to march against Naples, which still remained faithful to Ferdinand. But he impoliticly rejected this advice, and proceeded to reduce places and towns of less importance, saying, that Naples must of course fall to him. In the mean while, Ferdinand having strengthened himself in his capital, to which all the great men of his party likewise repaired, applied to the pope, and to the duke of Milan, for affistance in men and money, which both of them liberally gave him. He then again took the field, and was recovering some of the places he had lost, when he was favoured by a fresh revolution in Genea.

THAT inconstant city took an opportunity, in John's absence, to throw off the French yoke, by the affistance and instigation of the duke of Milan, who reconciled together the families of Adorni and Fregosa, and supplied them with troops and money. The French sent a sleet to Genoa, under Regnier of Anjou, John's father, to make good his party; but, while his forces were landing, he was deseated, and obliged to return to France. This misfortune served to render John the more intent on the conquest of Naples; but he was entirely deseated by Ferdinand, and obliged likewise to return to France.

LUCA PITTI still remained gonfalonier of Florence, Diffracwhere Cosmo, partly out of disgust, and partly because he was stons in now old and infirm, concerned himself very little in public Florence. business. Luca, being a bold enterprising magistrate, attempted to revive the Balia, or high commission, that had been abolished upon Cappom's death; but not suggesting, he brought troops into the city, and forced the people to agree: to all he demanded. He then proceeded to humble his chief. opponents, amongst whom was Girolama Machiavel, whom he banished, and who, after wandering, up and down Italy, exciting its princes and states to revenge his quarrel, was at last sent prisoner to Florence, where he died under confinement. Pitti, by this time, had succeeded to all Cosmo's . power in the state; but he was intemperate in the use of it. He ordered the name of prefidents of the trades, or artiffs, to be exchanged for that of prefidents of liberty; and instead of fitting, as the gonfaloniers used to do, on the right hand of the magistrates, he took place in the middle of them, as being their superior. He even carried his insolence so far as to claim the fanction of heaven for what he did, and ordered public processions and thanksgivings to be made for the restoration of his country's liberty. The presents he received from the wealthy citizens, are faid to have amounted in one year to twenty thousand ducats, and his magnificence was answerable. He built two sumptuous palaces; one within a mile of the city, the other within it. The latter, which, to this day, is called the palace of Pitti, is one of the most stupendous piles in Europe. It became afterwards the residence of the great dukes of Tuscany, and still attracts the admiration of foreigners. To carry on those fabrics, Pitti neglected no means that his high station put in his reach; and affaffins, thieves, and robbers were pardoned, on condition of their affifting to build it. Though Pitti's rapaciousness was applied to noble purposes, yet it set the most detestable example to his inferiors, who plundered their inferiors as he did them. Notwithstanding this, Florence was now become the admiration of the world for riches and magnificence. especially in buildings, by keeping itself neutral in all the differtions of Italy, particularly between the Malatesta family and the pope, who endeavoured to deprive them of Rimini and Cesena. Thus, for several years, the Florentines applied themselves entirely to the cultivation of the civil arts; and nothing else remarkable is recorded of them.

private subject of a republic, had more riches than any king Death and in Europe, and laid out more money in works of tafte, magcharacter nificence, learning, and charity, than all the kings, princes, of Cosmo. and states of that, the preceding, or the subsequent age, those of his own family excepted. The riches he was posfessed of would appear incredible, did not the monuments of his magnificence still remain, and did not his cotemporaries give us unquestionable testimonies both of them and his libe-They were such, that we are tempted to believe that he and his family knew of some channels of commerce that have been lost probably by the discovery of America, and the frequency of the East Indian commerce by sea, to which the Europeans, in his time, were almost strangers. He lent valt fums of money to the public, the payment of which he never required; and there scarcely was a citizen in Florence whom he did not, at one time or other, affift with money, without the smallest expectation of its being returned. His religious foundations were prodigious. He founded the convents and churches

In the year 1464 died Cosmo de Medici, who, though the churches of St. Mark and St. Laurence, the rich monastery of S. Verdiano, the church of Girolamo, the abbey belonging to it in the mountains of Fiefole, the church of the Friars Minors in Mugelli, with the abbeys of the Servi Agnoli and S. Minuato. Not contented with having founded fo many religious edifices, he endowed them likewise with rich furniture, magnificent altars, and chapels. His private buildings were equally fumptuous. His palace in Florence exceeded that of any fovereign prince in his time; and he had other palaces at Coreggio, Fiefole, Cafaggivolo, and Febrio. His munificence even reached Yerusalem, where he erected a noble hospital for poor diffreffed pilgrims.

In those works, of more than royal expence, he might Cosmo's have been equalled by men equally rich; but his deportment virtues. and manner was unexampled. In his private conversation he was humble, unaffected, unaffuming. Every thing regarding his own person was plain, modest, and nothing differing from the middling rank of citizens; thereby giving a proof, at once, of his virtue and his wisdom, because nothing is more dangerous in a commonwealth, such as Florence was, than pomp and parade. The expences of Cosmo were laid out for the embellishments of his country, and begot no envy, because all his fellow-citizens partook of them. He declined oftentation, even in his family-fettlements. He matched his two fons, John and Peter, into families of reputable citizens; and he married his grand-daughters in the same manner. Cosmo, however, with all that simplicity of life, had towering bold notions of his country's dignity and interest. His intelligence was beyond that of any prince, and there scarcely was a court in Europe where he did not entertain a private agent. By this means, he always had it in his power to disappoint, perplex, and confound the intrigues of his country's enemies. His long continuance in power, for thirty-one years, is a proof of his great abilities; and his so often disappointing and countermining the formidable confederacies and leagues which brought Florence, more than once, apparently to the brink of destruction, gives us the highest idea of his dexterity and management in the greatest undertakings. According to Machiavel 2, his wealth and credit were so extensive, that he forced the Venetians, the duke of Milan, and the king of Naples, into his own terms, merely by distressing them for money. After being recalled to his country, the short exile he suffered served to make him appear with the greater lustre, and to establish his influence in the commonwealth, whose

Machiavel, book vii.

learning,

dominions he increased, by adding to them Borgo di Sepelchrita Montidoglio, Casentino, and Valdibagna. The former part of his life, to his fortieth year, was tumultuous, and may be faid to have been unfortunate, being fometimes obliged to fave his life by flying in disguise from his enemies. But the noble foirit he snewed in making all his friends partakers of his riches and good fortune, at last fixed his felicity. His presence is faid to have been venerable, though his stature was mean; and, by the pictures we have of him, his features were strong His love of and harsh. He is not celebrated for learning, though he was the greatest patron of learned men of his age. By his own purse, he hired several learned Greeks to reside in Florence, and thereby revived the study of that tongue, and consequently of those arts that have rendered Italy, and that city in particular, so celebrated ever since his time. He entertained the famous Marslius Ficinus about his own person, and assigned him apartments near his own palace of Coreggio, that he might study with the more freedom and conveniency. He has been reproached with implacability towards his enemies, and for having driven a great many of his fellow citizens into exile: but it is easy to clear him from that charge, by confidering the nature of parties in Florence, which left Cosmo no choice between the destruction of his enemies or his country. He never was known to regret but two things. First, that he had not done all the good he wished to do to mankind. Secondly, that he had not fufficiently aggrandized his country. Notwithstanding his many religious endowments, Cosmo was no bigot; for one of his usual sayings was, That a commonwealth was not to be defended by beads in men's hands. Towards the end of his life, fome family misfortunes are faid to have given him uneafiness; and he was ashamed of having been duped by Sforza, duke of Milan. But all reproaches on his memory are wiped off by the unanimous confent of his fellow-citizens, who inscribed his tomb with the title of "Father of his Country."

and patrioti/m.

SECT.

Containing the History of Peter de Medici's Administration. The Venetians invade Tuscany; a Peace; Peter succeeded by his two Sons; their joint History; Conspiracy against them; Julio de Medici murdered. History of Florence under Lorenzo de Medici, and his Son Peter, who is ruined. New Model of the Florentine Government.

LEWIS XI. of France was at this time so employed in State of civil wars against his own nobility, that he could give Italy: little or no affiftance to the duke of Amou, in his claim either upon Genoa, or upon Naples. He therefore endeavoured to gain the friendship both of Sforza and Ferdinand, by suffering the latter to remain unmolested in his kingdom; and by enabling the former to become master of Genoa, which was the great object of his ambition. Sforza succeeded in this attempt, and fent his fon Galeazza at the head of fifteen hundred horse to the affistance of Lewis. The alliance between Ferdinand and Sforza was productive of great revolutions in Italy. 7acob Picinino was still formidable, though he had no territory. The reputation of his family, and his own valour and courage, had attached many to his service; and neither Sforza nor Fordinand thought themselves in safety, while he continued in a state of independence on both, and yet always ready to hire himself to the best paymaster. Ferdinand, therefore, having compromised matters with his great nobility, and ruined the duke of Anjou's party in Naples, endeavoured to make them sensible of his and their danger from Picinino, who, being without dominions, and at the head of the old Brachian army, the irreconcileable enemies of Naples, would not fail to acquire territorial possessions at their expence. Picinino, whose troops lay at Sulmona, foresaw or understood his danger; and not suspecting the secret connections that had been formed between Ferdinand and Sforza, he offered his service to the latter, and threw himself into Milan with no more than one hundred horse. Sforza received him with the greatdemonstrations of friendship, and Picinino was even marned to his natural daughter. Sforza, however, could not without jealousy behold a soldier of fortune so popular, and to respected all over the Milanese, as Picinino was; and, under pretence of ferving him, he undertook to reconcile him Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

Picinino put to deatb.

with Ferdinand, who actually took Picinino into his pay, and gave him one hundred thousand florins in advance. But after Picinino, with his wife and the Milanese ambassador, repaired to Florence, he and his son were decoyed by Ferdinand into the castle of Naples, and there put to death.

An ineffectual crufade.

FLORENCE, and all Italy, was at this time in peace, through the indefatigable pains of pope Pius II. in promoting a crusade against the infidels. Matthew king of Hungary, and Charles duke of Burgundy, were by his holiness declared generals of the armaments that were to be employed in this expedition; the Venetians having promised the shipping that was necessary for transporting the troops to Sclavonia, and Ancona was appointed to be the place of general rendezvous, and the pope accordingly repaired to that city. The refert of people thither was prodigious; but the whole proved to be a rope of fand. No arms had been provided, no magazines had been erected, and no money raised for the troops; so that the great numbers affembled in or near Ancona, ferved only to create a famine. The king of Hungary and the duke of Burgundy neglected to appear at the rendezvous; and the Venetians sent only a few gallies, to make a shew of having kept their word. Those disappointments, and his own advanced age, being now fixty-four, threw the pope into a chagnin, which proved mortal in the year 1464; and he was succeeded by Barbo, a Venetian, who took the name of Paul II. Soon after died Sforza, duke of Milan, and he was succeeded by his son Galeazzo.

Peter of trayed.

THOSE events produced great alterations in Florence. The Medici be- expedition against the Turks was dropt at the death of pope Pius; and the death of Sforza dissolved the union, in which the dread of his power had confirmed the Florentines. add to the public distractions, Peter de Medici, son and successor to the great Cosmo, was far inferior to his father in abilities, though he was a well meaning man, and might have made a great figure in another station. Dietisalvi Neroni had been the intimate companion and counsellor of Cosmo de Medici, who, upon his death-bed, recommended him in the fame capacity to his fon Peter. The latter, in ftrict obedience to his father's will, admitted Dietifalvi into his most private councils, and consulted him not only upon the management of the commonwealth, but upon his family affairs, which, it feems, then flood in need of occonomy. As Peter was polsessed of a great estate, he ordered his stewards, and all he had concerns with, to send in their accounts to Dietifalvi, on whom he relied to implicitly, that he looked very fittle into his own affairs. This gave the other a hint, that it might be easy to supplant Peter in his authority and power; and, after pretending to have examined the accounts laid before him, he told Peter, that the ready money he was in possession of was not sufficient for supporting his figure, and maintaining his credit in the state, without calling in his sather's debts. Peter inadvertently followed this plausible advice, and Cosmo's debtors were accordingly required to pay what they owed to his estate. This had not been foreseen or expected; and as there scarcely was a family or man of note in Florence to whom Cosmo had not lent money, Peter, by his demands, acquired a vast number of enemies, who upbraided him for deviating from his sather's principles, and for oppressing his sellow-citizens by his avarice.

WHEN the reader reflects, that the power of the Medici Reflection in Florence was rather personal than constitutional, and that it upon his rested in a great measure upon private attachments to the power. family, he will not be furprifed at the effect of so general a clamour, which was increased by the then state of parties in the republic. Luca Pitti, whom we have already mentioned, continued still to be possessed of great power in the state; but Distifatoi knew, that, now Cosmo was dead, his abilities would appear infufficient for supporting his ambition, which was to fucceed Cosmo in the intire direction of affairs. Agnolo Acciaiveli and Nicolo Soderini were two other citizens of great weight and authority, but both of them secret enemies to the bouse of Medici. Soderini thought their power was unconfitutional, and inconsistent with public liberty. The enmity of Acciaiveli was personal, and arose from the following grounds. His son Rafael had married Alessandra, of the Bards family, with a large fortune; but family-discontents arising, one of her friends, by force of arms, took her from her hufband and his family, who complained of this violence; and the matter was referred to the decision of Cosmo de Medici. His sentence was, That the lady's fortune should be restored to her and her family, and that she should be intirely at her own disposal. Acciaiveli refented this determination, and refolved to be revenged on Peter, though he could not upon Colmo. All those citizens disguised their private sentiments under plausible pretexts. They exclaimed against the monopoly of power in one family; and that it was necessary to He ground testore the constitution to its first principles, by restoring the unpopular magistrates to their regular functions in the government. The numerous bankruptcies, which happened by Peter's demands, foon increased this spirit of discontent, which was trowned by a treaty of marriage entered into by Peter between his fon Lerenze and a Roman lady of the noble family of Orsi-

X 2

ni.

ni. This match corresponded so little with his father's principles, that Peter was publicly reviled as being ambitious and arrogant, in not marrying his fon into a Florentine family.

Public ex-

NOTWITHSTANDING all those murmurings and disconbibitions. tents, the Medici family had still a vast sway in Florence; and, Cosino being now dead a year, it was thought proper to exhibit some public shews, that might divert the minds of the people from state-affairs. The Florentines were excessively fond of such exhibitions; one of which represented the three kings of the East, following the star of our Saviour's nativity to Bethlehem, and was performed with such pomp and magnificence as employed all Florence five months in preparing it. This exhibition was fucceeded by justs and tournaments, in which the Florentine youth challenged those of all Italy; but Lorenzo de Medici, the eldest son of Peter, bore the praise of address and valour from them all.

Milan.

THOSE shews being over, the public discontents revived. part with The authority of the balia was near expired; and a great the duke of party was for discontinuing it, and putting the government upon its ancient foundation. But other difficulties now occurred. Galeazzo, the young duke of Milan, demanded that the subsidy paid by the Florentines to his father should be continued to him. This was strongly opposed by a great party, who thought that Galeazzo did not deserve the same consideration his father had done; and that the payment of the subsidy ought to cease at the latter's death. Peter de Melici was of a very different opinion. He reproached the other party with avarice, and an ill-timed frugality; and urged, that the liberty of Florence must be ruined by the Venetians, if the should separate herself from the duke of Milan, whole youth and inexperience would render him an easy prey to that republic. The people, in general, did not relish Peter's reatoning; and his enemies now held private meetings; and subscribed to affociations for his ruin. But when they came to deliberate upon particulars, Peter's enemies could agree in nothing. The wifest and most public-spirited part of them were for immediately putting an end to the power of the balia, and for restoring the old form of government. They urged, that this must ruin Peter's power, without doing any injury to the peace of the public; and that any violent methods would give him great advantages, by affording him a specious pretext for arming himself and his party. They who were of the opposite opinion urged the danger of delays, and the folly of fuffering Peter to live in a city where his interest was so powerful, and where he might make a bad use of it; and that the other opinion was more plausible than practicable.

They added, that they never could have to favourable an opportunity, as then presented itself, for Peter's ruin; and that they ought immediately to take the marquis of Ferrara into their pay, to put themselves in arms, and to call a fenate which should finish the work. One Nicolo Fidino, who was Conspiracy secretary to the meetings of Peter's enemies, suffered himself against to be corrupted; and he made a sull discovery to Peter of all Peter discovered, was startled at seeing the power and numbers of his enemies, and had recourse to a counter-association, in which he succeeded so well, that he prevailed with great numbers to subscribe for him, though they had subscribed against him before.

THE time for the choice of a new magistracy being now He retains arrived, Nicolo Soderini, whom we have already mentioned, lis power, was chosen gonfalonier, with such unanimity and applause of his fellow-citizens, that he was crowned with an olive-garland, upon his exaltation to that dignity, as a fign they depended on him for restoring peace and liberty to the state. Nicolo had good intentions, and was bold and spirited; but his brother Thomas was a wifer man, and a determined friend to the house of Medici. He advised Nicolo to persevere in his defign of restoring the old constitution of government, of making new imborsations, and establishing a set of magistrates who should be at once friends to the peace and the liberties Nicolo attempted all this; but found it of their country. impracticable to be executed, through the opposition it met with from the violent party. The time of his magistracy therefore expired, without his doing any thing answerable to the high idea conceived of him. This inefficacy gave great advantages to Peter, whose party was now more united and Arengthened than ever; and his enemies found it adviseable to temporize for fome months. Finding, however, that they lost ground every day, they resolved to make use of force, to kill Peter, who then lay fick at his house at Coreggio, and to inwhen the marguis of Ferrara with his troops to their affiltance. They then resolved to rush armed into the senate-house, and oblige the members to come into their measures, by estab-Thing such a magistracy as they should prescribe. Distisalvi ad a great hand in those resolutions; but diffembled so well, hat he every day attended Peter, and gave him his advice, relating to public affairs, feemingly with great fincerity.

PETER had early and certain intelligence of all his and takes memies designs, and resolved to be beforehand with them. arms, ammoning his friends, he put himself and them in arms; and declared, that he had received a letter from Giovanni Ben-rara was in full march, at the head of an army, against Flarence. He then fet out for that city, and, without his enemies suspecting his design, entered it. They immediately ran to arms likewise; but were inferior, both in numbers and ap-Diotifalvi, in consternation, pearance, to Peter's friends. ran about, sometimes persuading the senators, and sometimes. Pitti, to oblige Peter to lay down his arms. Nicolo Soderini put himself at the head of the common people of that quarter of the town where he lived, and repaired to Pitti, when' he strenuously exhorted to appear on horseback against Para and to encourage the fenators to oppose him. But Pitti, where had been before this time brought over to the party of the Medici, was so far from following Soderine's advice, that be, obliged him to return to his house, declaring, that his intend tion was to refer all matters in dispute to the senate, and the every man should lay aside his arms. This declaration of Pin was of great fervice to Peter; and many, who had been the most forward against him, now appeared on his side. fenators still continued to be shut up in the palace, withou coming to any determination; but an accommodation w now let on foot, and it was refolved, that a deputation show be fent to Peter, who remained indisposed at his house, complain of the tumults in the city, which had been begin by his taking arms, and to know his meaning and reasons to His enemies to doing. Peter's answer was, that he had been constrained by the injustice of his enemies, and by their secret unwas rantable cabals against his life and dignity, to put himself f arms; that he had remained, ever fince his re-entering Pa rence, upon the defensive, without stirring from his own house that his enemies were mistaken, if they imagined he had an intention of reviving the power of the balia, or of depriving the magistrates of their authority; that neither he nor h father had ever had such intentions; and that it was not owing to them that the powers of the balia were continued. then reproached them with ingratitude to Cosmo, and the mily of the Medici; and with their not thinking themselve fafe to live in the same city with him, who was the son their greatest benefactor. He next addressed himself, in more particular manner, to Diotisalvi, and others, who under the greatest obligations to his father and his family, in fo spirited a manner, that it was with difficulty he restrained his friends from putting them to death. He concluded by declaring, that all he meant was to live in peace and fecunity. and that he was ready to refer all matters in dispute to the senate.

baffled,

THE heads of the opposite party, however, were far from and batrusting to Peter's professions. Nicolo Soderini, after com-nished. mitting the care of his family to his brother, retired to his house in the country; and it was easy to see that the city was upon the eve of a new revolution. Bernardo Lotti, one of Pater's adversaries, was then gonfalonier; but upon the expiration of the time of his magistracy, he was succeeded, in 1464, by Roberto Lioni, who no fooner entered upon his office than he summoned the people, and created a new balia and magistracy, composed of Peter's friends.

UPON this, Agnolo Acciaiveli fled to Naples; Dietisalvi, and Fall of Nicolo Soderini, to Venice; Giovanni Neroni, archbishop of Pitti. Flerence, took refuge in Rome: and thus the whole faction, that had opposed the house of Medici, were diffipated and attainted; for all who fled were declared rebels. Those who 42d the courage to stay were put under confinement, and some were even put to death, while others underwent the Luca Pitti, relying upon the connections he had formed with Peter de Medici, had the courage to remain in Florence; but fell from the height of popularity into the most abject contempt: all his friends were either ruined themselves, or had abandoned him, and none ventured to take any public notice of him. A stop was put to the magnificent edifices he had begun, and many now demanded restitution of the presents they had made him for carrying them on.

THE exiled Florentines, as usual, formed cabals and con- Intrigues of spiracies for restoring themselves to their country. But Ag- the exiles. nole Acciaivali, before he entered upon any practices of that kind, fent an apology for his conduct in a letter to Peter; putting him in mind of his fidelity and fufferings for the house of Medici, and for Cosmo in particular. He declared at the some time, that he had no motive for opposing Peter, but the service of his country, which he was afraid might suffer, if Peter, who was in a bad state of health, should die. Peter answered this letter in a very sarcastical manner, and put Acciaivoli in mind of the great rewards he had received for his fervices to his father; and concluded with the following expression, " If you have been rewarded for your merits, it is " but just you should be punished for your offences. never can plead the love of your country as an excuse, as " it is well known that the family of Medici have been as 46 good friends as ever that of Acciaivoli were to Florence. "Live therefore where you are in disgrace, as you knew not " how to live here with honour."

THIS remarkable letter breathes the spirit of those times, and thews the rancour of the two factions against one X 4 another.

tians declare against Florence,

Acciaivoli, finding his application defeated, went another. to Rome, where many of the other exiles refided, and did all they could to blast the credit of the house of Medici there; but to no purpose. Diotisalvi and Nicolo Soderini, on the The Vene-other hand, applied to Giovanni Francisco of Ferrara, the fon of Palla Strozzi, who had been banished from Florence in 1438, and brought him to join with them in folliciting the doge and senate of Venice, in affishing them to drive the Medicean faction out of Florence. They put the Venetians in mind, that all the losses they had sustained in Lombardy were owing to Cosmo de Medici; and they represented Peter and his party as a treacherous bloody set of men, who had usurped the government of their country, and had banished, or put to death, her best friends and patriots; and they concluded with imploring the compassion of a state which enjoyed its liberty, in favour of one that was enflaved. Those arguments were so well received by the Venetians, that they ordered their general Bartolomeo Coglione to invade the Florentine territories, and to join his troops with those of the duke of Ferrara, under Erale d'Este.

and invade

IT appears that the Florentines did not expect this invation. Tuscany. Peter de Medici, and his friends, had celebrated days of folemn thanksgiving for the preservation of the state, and the re-union of their government; but they had taken no meafures for warding off the blow that now fell upon them. The combined army having entered the Florentine territories, committed great ravages, and the Florentines applied for affifiance to the king of Naples, and the duke of Milan, appointing the count of Urbino at the same time their general. Ferdinand readily promised them his affistance, and sent them some troops under the command of his fon Alphonfo; but Galeazzo came in person to their relief. We are however to understand, that the Florentines were to pay for their succours, and had advanced great sums for that purpose. The rendezvous of their army was appointed to be at Castracuzo, a Florentine town between Tuscany and the Romagna; but before the armies could be allembled, the Venetians and their allies had retreated to Inolas Discontents with little or no loss. This created great discontents amongst the Florentines, who loudly accused their field-deputies, or council of war, with milmanagement, and blamed them with having squandered the public money to no purpose. It soon appeared that the fault lay in Galeazzo, a young unexperienced prince, and without any talents for war. A few inconsiderable skirmishes however ensued, and the Florentine council of war declared, that they could expect no success while Galax-

70

at Florence.

bim to return to Milan, on pretence that if he should come to any missfortune in the field, his person was of so great consequence to the common cause, that their state must be ruined. They represented at the same time, that having but lately succeeded to his dukedom, his presence might be necessary in his own dominions. An application so seemingly respectful, prevailed on Galeazzo to return immediately to Milan.

THIS obstacle being removed, the Florentines and their Aremarkallies took the field, and one of those ridiculous battles, able battle. which was so common in those days, was fought: for though it lasted for half a day, no person was killed on either side, and neither gained the least advantage; only a sew horses being wounded, and some prisoners made.

This battle, however, though it may be faid to have A peace been bloodless, was decisive. Winter coming on, the Vene-concluded. tian general was obliged to retire to Ravenna. The Milanele and the Neapolitans returned to their several countries, and the Florentines to Tuscany. The Florentine exiles, animated by resentment and despair, would have kept the field; but their followers beginning to clamour for money, they were obliged Distifalvi took refuge in Ferrara, where he to disperse. met with a kind reception from that duke. Nicolo Acciaivole fled to Ravenna, where the Venetians settled a pension upon him, and he there died in old age. Unsteadiness and want of resolution occasioned his missortunes; but he had the reputation of being brave and honest. The Venetians now found that the Florentine exiles had been too fanguine in their expectations of an infurrection in that city; and feeing that they were no longer to be depended upon, began to listen to an accommodation, which was concluded with little or no difficulty. The Florentines might now have lived quiet, had not the remains of faction still been alive amongst them. To complete the public misfortunes, Peter de Medici, though not much above fifty years of age, was so infirm and feeble, that he could not ftir abroad, and was ignorant of the intrigues and heart-burnings that prevailed amongst his fellow citizens, who feemed to make use of the peace they had acquired abroad, only that they might profecute their diffentions more furiously at home. Many of the wifest and most virtuous amongst them, had behaved with moderation during the late troubles, and all fuch were branded by the violent as being friends to the exiles and the outed faction. Bardo Altoviti, who was then the gonfalonier of justice, encreased the disorders of the public by displacing from their office many citizens, and banishing others.

TA

Peter de Medici ebecks the Florentines of bis party.

AT last the oppression, pride, and tyranny of those in power, came to Peter's ears; but being confined to his bed, he could apply no other remedy but earnest exhortations for unanimity, and remonstrances upon the danger of their enemies returning and driving them out of the city. To give some amusement at the same time to their restless spirits, the marriage of his fon Lorenzo with Clarice of Orfini, was now celebrated with all the profusion of pomp and magnificence which Peter's great wealth could furnish, and the fertile genius of the Reventines invent. After many luxurious days, the representation of a battle on horseback, and the storming of a town, were exhibited and conducted with the utmost decorum and address. Those amusements diverted the public for some time; but the spirit of faction recurred with such violence, that Peter, whose infirmities every day increased, found himself under the necessity of altering the whole system of his conduct. For this purpose he called before him the chief Florentines: he bitterly reproached them for their ambition, their rapaciousness, their having monopolized to themfelves the revenues of the public, the estates of their exiles, with all the honours and dignities in the city; and not contented even with that, had exercised their power with injustice and cruelty over the innocent, by their violence and venality. He concluded his speech by solemnly assuring them, that unless they amended their behaviour, he should repent of his successes, and find means to make them repent the abuse of their power.

His defigns, IT appears from this speech, that the spirit and intellects of Peter were still vigorous, and his name was so much respected, that they to whom it was addressed returned him a respectful answer. In a few days, however, they relapsed into all their former disorders, and Peter privately invited Acciaiveli to come to his house at Cassaviole, to consult with him about the reformation of the state; and according to Machiavel², they had resolved to recal all the exiles, and to repress the sury of the sactious citizens, when Peter de Medici died, in the sisty-third year of his age.

death,

and reflec. When a great family or man is illustrious for private virtions on bis tues, their public conduct often meets with applause that it character. does not deserve. Nothing seems to be more certain, than that the fundamental constitution of Florence had been more than once subverted by the two last heads of the house of Medici, and that Peter particularly had been too inflexible and vindictive against some of the greatest and worthiest of the Florentines. He saw his error when it was too late to mend it; and he would gladly have reinstated in their country the very men whom he had but some years before so ignominiously spurned out of it. In other respects, Peter seems to have been no unworthy descendant of his race. In his person he appears to have been brave and resolute. The unpopularity into which he fell at one part of his life, proceeded from his trusting too much to his father's friends; and to this he was partly obliged, by his not being able, thro' his infirmities, to look into his own affairs in person. He certainly wished as well to his country as the violence of the factions formed against him gave him leave; and he had the art, when her original constitution was restored, still to retain his influence and authority in the state. He was buried near his father in the church of St. Lawrence with vast pomp.

SEVERAL other deaths of great consequence happened in Italy at the same time, particularly those of Borso d'Este, marquis of Ferrara, who was succeeded by his son Hercules, and of Gismond of Rimini, whose son and successor was Robert. The next death of consequence was that of pope Paul II. which happened in 1471. He was succeeded by Sixtus IV. one of the most enterprising pontiss that had ever mounted the papal throne, and likewise one of the most successful, though a Deaths of man of no family, and of as little virtue: he owed his advancement to hypocrify, and the appearance of fanctity. princes. He had two fons, Peter and Girolamo, whom he called his nephews: he made the former a cardinal, an order which. now appeared in its greatest lustre: he stripped Anionio Ordelaff of the city of Forli, which his family had possessed many years, and gave it to Girolamo, who likewise received the city of Imola in dower with his wife Catharine, natural daughter to the duke of Milan. In short, the lustre and power of the popedom never had been so high as now; and it was owing to a cause that naturally ought to have contributed to diminish both, I mean the growing power of the infidels, who were now masters of Negroponte. The consternation this occafoned in Europe, but more particularly in Italy, united the Christian princes amongst themselves; and all turned their eyes towards the pope, for stopping the progress of the infidels, which could only be done by his bulls and exhortations. Neither Paul II. nor Sixtus IV. had any fuch intention; but they were of great use to princes who wanted to raile armies, and maintain them cheap, under pretence of crusades; for after that pretence was dropt, the pope generally gave those princes who favoured them most, an indulgence or power to apply in their own private purposes what number number of troops so raised they pleased. Thus most of the Christian potentates, about this time, found their account in paying a most slavish submission to the see of Rome, which the popes, especially the Italians, well knew how to improve to the utmost.

Peter succeeded by bis two sons.

PETER de Medici lest two sons, Lorenzo and Giulian, both of them, particularly the eldest, of great hopes, but as yet too young for taking into their own hands the reins of government. Not only the people of Florence therefore, but most of the princes of Italy, turned their eyes upon Thomas Soderini, who was then the leading man in Florence, and as fuch paid him their compliments; but Thomas gave on that occasion a noble and difinterested proof of the attachment he had always professed to the family of Medici. He did not even deign to answer the letters of felicitation which the Italian princes fent to him; and he took all occasions to recommend the sons of Peter de Medici to his fellow-citizens, as the proper objects of their love and regard. At last, that he might confirm them in their interests, he summoned the heads of all the Florentine nobility to the convent of S. Antonio, and presented to them the two young noblemen, requesting them to maintain them in the full possession of the honour and authority of their house, as being the surest means of confulting the tranquillity and independency of Florence; adding, that every other power fet up in the state, than that of the Medici family, must be tumultuous and short-lived. having finished his speech, Lorenzo, the eldest brother, addressed the assembly in so manly, yet moving a manner, as to convince them that he would one day become an honour and ornament to his country; infomuch that all prefent before the affembly broke up, fwore folemnly to stand by Lorenzo and his brother, as if they were their own children; while the two brothers promised to obey the nobility present as their fathers; and from thenceforth those young men were looked upon as the princes, or leading persons of the city, and they were so wise as to be directed by Thomas Soderini.

Fidelity of Soderini to them.

Conspiracy against Prato, WHILE every thing was thus quiet in Florence, a dangerous conspiracy broke out in its territory. The two heads of the samily of Nardi had, during the late commotions, been first banished, and then declared rebels; their names were Silvester and Bernardo. The latter being poor, head-strong, and resolute, consulted how he might raise a war in Tustam, that might weaken and divide his countrymen. Having many acquaintances amongst the Pistoians, a people remarkably turbulent and warlike, especially in the samily of Palandri, who had a great estate in the country of Pistoia, he consulted with them how he could surprise Prato, another city and district belonging to the Florentines. He was encouraged in his design by the discontents which appeared against the Florentine magistrates in Pistoia, and likewise in Prato; and he opened his mind upon the subject to Diotisalvi, to know his opinion, whether he was to expect support from other states and princes if he should succeed in surprising Prate? Dietifalvi thought the attempt was both hazardous and improbable; but glad of every opportunity to be revenged upon his countrymen, he diffembled his fentiments, and undertook to engage both the Ferrarese and the Bolognese to send assistance to Bernardo, if he could surprise Prato, and maintain possession of it fifteen days. Upon this affurance, Bernardo secretly renewed his application to the Palandri family, who promised to back him; and repairing privately to Prate, he formed a small party of the discontented, who engaged to favour his admission into the town. As the force with which Bernardo proposed to execute this enterprize was very disproportioned to its importance and danger, he proceeded by stratagem: he knew that in time of peace the governors of the towns in Tuscary are not very scrupulous of admitting the inhabitants by night; and it was agreed between him and his party in Prate, that they should be in arms by a certain hour, to fayour his entrance, when he should present himself before the town, and Diotifalvi was punctually informed of all that passed.

ALL the force that Bernardo could collect, confisted of which is about one hundred horse, and being exact to his time, one of defeated, his party within the place applied to Cefar Petrucci, the Flo- and the rentine governor, for the keys of the gates to admit a citizen, conspira. and Petrucci readily sent them by one of his own servants, tors puwhom the conspirators secured before he reached the gate. and forcing the keys from him, they admitted Bernardo and his attendants into the town, where he was joined by the They then divided themselves into two other conspirators. parties; one of them headed by Silvester, a Pratonese, who surprised the citadel, and the other by Bernardo, who took polletion of the palace, and made 'Petrucci and his family prisoners. After this they ran through the town and proclaimed liberty; but no sooner did day break, than the inhabitants, rather amazed at than favouring the revolution, afsembled in the market-place without joining Bernardo. The administration of the civil government of Prato was held under the Florentines by eight of the citizens, who immediately met in their palace to deliberate how to behave. By this time Bernardo and his party, after traverling the town, found that they had been joined by few or none of the initabitants; and therefore, as his last tentative, he demanded to be admitted to a conference with the eight magistrates. This being granted, he declared, that he wanted to rescue them from slavery, and to restore them to their ancient liberties: he expatiated upon the glory that would attend their joining him: he laid before them the certainty of being succoured, if they would hold out the place but for a few days; and he assured them, that they would be supported by a strong party in Florence, who were ready to declare for them as soon as they heard that the townsmen joined him.

THE magistrates answered with great steadiness, that the Florentine government had always been such, as to give them no reason for revolting from it; they therefore thought that his best course would be to abandon his desperate enterprize. to release the podesta and his family, and to leave the town. Bernardo was so far from following this advice, that he gave immediate orders for bringing forth the podefta, and hanging him before the windows of the palace. This inhuman command was on the point of being executed. The podesta anpeared at the window with the halter about his neek, but before he was turned off, addressing himself to Bernade, he put him in mind of his folly in ordering him to be hanged. by affuring him, that his murder would render the Pratonele his irreconcileable enemies; and that if he granted him his life, he had a chance of accomplishing his defign, because he (the podesta) would be then able to do him service.

THIS artful speech saved the podesta's life. Bernarda thought he could not do better than to take his advice; and after obliging him to harangue the people in favour of the conspiracy, he re-committed him to prison. By this time the inhabitants, having recovered from their consternation, and seeing what a despicable handful followed Bernards, they began to look upon the conspiracy rather as ridiculous than dangerous; and the Florentines, who then lived at Prate, with the best affected citizens, putting themselves under the command of Georgio Ginori, a knight of Rhodes, attacked Bernardo as he was haranguing the people in the market-place, wounded and took him prisoner, released the podesta, and either killed or took prisoners the rest of the conspirators Florence was filled with most dismal relations of this conspiracy, which represented the place to be taken; the podefix and his family to be put to death, the Pistoians all in arms, and many of the Florentines themselves to favour the revolt The magistrates immediately ordered as many troops as the shortness of the time would permit to be got together, and give the command of them to Robert di St. Severino, who was reckoned to be a good officer, with orders to march directly towards Prato; but he soon had reason to return, by the news which met him from Petrucci on the road. When Death of Bernardo was brought to Florence, being questioned by the the chief magistrates about the madness of his attempt, he excused it conspirator. by faying, that he chose to die in Florence rather than live in exile, and that his latter end should be signalized by some memorable event.

IT is observed by Machiavel2, that the tranquility restored Change in to Florence by the prudence and moderation of her govern- the manment, and the defeat of the above ill-judged conspiracy, in-ners of the troduced an alteration of manners amongst the citizens. Floren-Their dress, their entertainments of all kinds, and their di-tines. verfions, especially amongst the younger fort, were now extravagant. Their estates were lost by gaming, or spent upon women. New modes of speech and talking were invented, and a farcaffical turn of wit was introduced into conversation. The truth is, the cultivation of the polite arts, which flourished now more in Florence than in any part of the world, was, perhaps, of no service to the morals of its inhabitants, whose estates could afford them the refinements and luxuries of life, especially at a time of prosound tranquility and great opulence. But those abuses and innovations were greatly heightened by the arrival of the duke and duchess of Milan at Florence, under pretence of performing a vow of devotion. They were attended by their whole court, which was very folendid; and their reception was equally so, the Florentines thinking they could not fufficiently express their gratitude for fo good an ally, and their regard for so great a prince. The Milanese courtiers, however, though Italians, were of a very different cast from those of the rest of Europe; for, tho it was Lent time, and tho' they were in the very neighbourhood of the holy see, they would taste nothing but flesh and animal food of all kinds. Public exhibitions were now renewed, for the entertainment of the illustrious guests; and the church of St. Spirito was burnt down, in representing in it the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the disciples; so that when the court of Milan left Florence, those extravagancies had proceeded to such a height, that a sumptuary law was passed, by the interest of the more wise and considerate citizens, for restraining such expences in time to come; and this law extended not only to apparel and entertainments, but to funeral expences.

War with

As Lorenzo de Medici advanced in years, he found himlest Volterra. more and more uneasy under the tutelage of Soderini, and began to listen to those who advised him to throw it off. A difference that happened at this time between the Florentines and the Volterrans, served to widen the breach. A mine of allum was discovered by certain private citizens of Volterra, who applied to those of Florence for their affishance and protection in working the mine. The community of Velterra at first disregarded this undertaking; but, perceiving what profits arose from it, they claimed the mine as lying in grounds belonging to the public, and fent a deputation to Florence, who made that demand. The matter was referred to a committee of citizens, who reported it as their opinion, that the claim of the Volterrans was unjust, and that as private perfons had been at the trouble and expence of working the mine, it was their property, they paying only some acknowledgment to the community, because it lay in their grounds. This report threw the city of Volterra into a flame, the people infifting upon the mine being delivered up to them, and the proprietors urging the expences they had been at in working it, and the judgment of the Florentines in their favour. Those disputes produced tumults, in which a citizen of rank; one Pecorino, was killed, the houses of many of his party were facked or burnt, and the lives of the Floreritine magifirstes, who resided there, were endangered. Those disorders produced another deputation from Volterra to Florence; and the deputies, by orders of their principals, declared, that the maintaining their citizens in their rights, was the price of their subjection to Florence.

THOMAS SODERINI and Lorenzo de Medici differed upon this occasion. The former was of opinion, that the Volterrans ought to be gratified, and that the flames of war, raised so near themselves, might reach Florence. He urged the restless ambition of the pope; his connections with the king of Naples, who was a powerful prince; and the uncertainty of Florence being supported by the Venetians, or the duke of Milan, as neither the good faith of the former, nor the courage of the latter, was to be depended on; and concluded with observing, that a lean peace was preserable to a fat victory. Lorenzo de Medici, on the other hand, urged; that if the insolence of the Volterrans went unpunished, all other states and places in subjection or dependence to Florence; would follow their example; and that they never would be without pretexts for so doing. Lorenzo's opinion prevailed; and the Florentine senate sent back the Volterran deputies with this answer, that they must either submit to the terms prescribed them, or prepare for a war. The Volterrans choice the latter, and applied for affishance to the princes and states of Italy, who, all but the Siennese and the lord of Piombino, were deaf to their representations. All, therefore, the Volterrans could do, was to fortify their city, and to hire one boufand mercenaries for defending it.

In the mean while the Florentines, sensible how dangerous which is delays are in such cases, raised an army of ten thousand foot sacked. and two thousand horse, and gave the command of it to heir general Frederick, lord of Urbino, who immediately reluced all the open country of Volterra, and laid fiege to the city itself, which he battered with great violence on its most ecceffible fide. Upon this the Volterran mercenaries, in a manner, deferted the defence of the city; but were very forward in infulting the citizens, who made the best resistance they could; but were obliged to submit to the mercy of the Florentines. No capitulation having been made, the magifracy of Volterra was dissolved, and the city given up for a whole day to the plunder of the Florentines, who were joined by the foldiers who had been hired to defend it. acus of this success was received with great joy at Florence, and Soderini was insulted upon it by the friends of Lorenzo de Medici. The event, however, did not alter that wise man's ppinion. He declared, that he looked upon the conquest of Volterra to be a loss rather than an acquisition to Florence; which might have been benefited by it, had it been taken by capitulation; but that, as it was taken by fack, it would, in time of war, be a thorn in the fides of the Florentines, and in time of peace a useless burden upon them.

. THE ambition of pope Sixtus every day disclosed itself more Ambition and more. His professed design was to re-annex to the of the pope's church all the territories and places that ever had belonged ber; and with that view he had stormed Spoletto, and hid siege to Citta di Castello, then in possession of Nicolo Vi-E. This nobleman was the intimate friend of Lorenzo de ledici, who, upon his application to him, sent him some mailance; a proceeding which laid the foundation of many calamities to the house of Medici. The pope took the place, and fent his son Peter, whom he had created cardiof Sife, to endeavour to form a league amongst the Itaprinces against Florence. This cardinal, under all the isdvantages of birth and education, which was in a conhad great abilities both for peace and war, and an Mare of ambition; so that his father employed him as chief confident and first minister. Under pretence of dohonour to the nuptials of the marquis of Ferrara, he made a kind of a tour through Lombardy, and other p · Italy, and particularly to Venice, which he wanted to a in the league against the Florentines. But, by this time the Venetians and the duke of Milan were alarmed ambition, and the great progress of the pope, when by fuch a counsellor and minister; and the former, it fecretly gave him poison, which, upon his return to put an end to his life. After this the Florentines joined alliance with the duke of Milan and the Venetians; bu was left for the pope and the king of Naples to acced Another league was formed between the above thre tracting powers, into which they invited the leffer st enter, for maintaining the balance of power in Italy, was endangered by a new dispute between the king of and the Venetians. The former laid claim to the if Cyprus, which the latter was in possession of; and the taking the king's part, all Italy was engaged in the c Frederick of Urbino still continued to head the Florent my; and his reputation as a general was fo high, tl pope and Ferdinand offered him very high terms to into their service. Urbino made some difficulty of this the pope prevailed upon him to undertake a journey ples, which the Florentines as strenuously endeavoured fuade him from, by putting him in mind of the fate of Picinino. Frederick, however, went to Naples, where received with a profusion of honours, and accepted proposed service, and thus became general of the against the Florentines.

Mod. HIST! VOL. XXXVI.

wsgą

Parties
and intrigues in Italy.

New alliances. Notwithstanding those dispositions, and the diambition of all the parties concerned in them, no was out in Italy for two years; but every thing was manathe way of intrigue or negotiation. The Florentini into their pay, as their general, Robert of Rimini, retheir league with the Perugians, and entered into new nections with the government of Faenza. The pope a king, on the other hand, strove all they could to deta Venetians from the Florentines, as being the only means of taining the pope's late acquisitions to the church, and c serving his son Girolamo in the possession of his estates Romagna.

CHARLES, the youngest son of the samous B was still alive, and had, for some years, served in the tian armies. The time of his engagements being expired to renew them, and informed the Venetians the designed to attempt to recover his right to Perugia, was his inheritance from his father. The Venetians sented to this, notwithstanding the league between the Perugians and the Florentines. The latter to itrenuously supported the former, that Charles, despairing of making any progress against them, turned his army against the Siemes. His pretext was, that they were debtors to his father, for services done their state; and he attacked them so surjously, as to put their government in great danger. The Siennese, upon this, from their natural inclination always to believe the worst of the Florentines, complained of them to the pope and the king of Naples, alledging, that all the misfortunes of Sienna were owing to the Florentines having persuaded Charles to attack them, instead of the Perugians. They fent deputies to Florence with the like complaints. The Florentines not only firmly denied the charge; but, to prove their innocence, ordered an ambassy to be sent to Charles, requiring him to abandon his expedition against the Siennese, under pain of their displeasure. It is probable, that this ambassy was more the effect of the fear of a confederacy against them, than of any regard they had for the Siennese: for though Charles was obliged to fubmit, yet he reproached the Florentines as cowards, and enemies to themselves; because, as he gave out, he intended to have delivered up the city of Sienna, which he was upon the point of taking, to the Florentines; a present we cannot well imagine he would have made them, but upon some previous contract. The Siennese were so much of that opinion, that they did not even thank the Florentines for their deliverance, though apparently it was owing to them. But an amazing revolution now happened in Milan, in the following manner.

GALEAZZO duke of Milan was, according to some Character writers, the picture of one of the tyrants of antiquity. His love of money was the source of his missortunes, as it led him to violate the honour of his greatest subjects, in the most tender point. He generally ruined those whom he injured; some of them he put to death, and others he deprived of their rights and possessions, that none of them might retain in their hands the means of resentment. At home he was despotic: abroad he was powerful in his relations and alliances: and the instruments of his tyranny being likewise the companions of his pleasures, no time was left him for reflection. His cruelty proceeded to far as to torture those whom he put to death; and it was even faid, that he dispatched out of the world his own mother, because he thought her an obstacle to the perpetration of his crimes. Notwithstanding all this complicated guilt, Galeazzo, perhaps, might have reigned and died in peace, had he not openly gloried in his vices, and published to all the world the names of those who he had dishonoured.

and murder of the duke of Milan.

A SCHOOL-MASTER, a profession at that time ex in Italy fometimes by the greatest ministers of state, ar in the highest esteem, became an instrument in deli the world from this monster. His name was Cola, a of Mantua, to whose lessons the noblest youths in Mi paired. He was a man of learning; but had applied hir much to reading, studying, and teaching the Greek and classics, that he became an enthusiast in favour of repr government. The general topics on which he decl was the unhappiness of being governed by a fingle man, subjects were his slaves and beasts of burden, and the g being born in a republic, where alone true merit and met with protection, rewards, and honours; and he voured to prove from history, that the greatest men ages were republicans. He had three noble pupils, G Andrea Lampognano, Carlo Visconti, and Girolamo (whose brains were touched by his repeated declamation to them he opened himself without reserve, by ackno ing that he meant all he faid should be applied to the vereign the duke of Milan; and that the most glorious human nature could perform, was to remove a tyrant The noblemen were too young as yet to e the world. his doctrine, by affaffinating their fovereign; but he of from them a promise that they would do it, and there liver their country as foon as their strength and age permit them. This resolution, instead of being weal was every day strengthened in them, by the growing and tyranny of the duke, and by the private injuries l flicted upon their persons, particularly by his amours i families of Visconti and Olgiato, and by keeping Andru the possession of the abbey of Miramondo, which had given him by the pope, on the refignation of a kin The design being thus fixed, the chief care of the c rators was to make fure of their blow, rather than to against the consequences; but they were far from negl even those; for they vainly imagined that the mome tyrant was dispatched, their countrymen would unanit embrace their liberty. The frequent meetings they created no suspicions at the duke's court, where their a friendship and intimacy was well known. In those me they generally practifed upon one another, with their di in their sheaths, the methods of giving the most r blows, and of stabbing the most vulnerable parts of the Being complete in this exercise, their next deliberation

o fix on the spot of assassination, which they resolved should when the duke went to St. Stephen's church in procession spon that faint's day. It does not appear that they opened heir real design to any of their friends; but, as arms at his time were almost the only laws known to the Italian tates, they found pretexts for persuading many of their comsanions to arm themselves, and their servants, and to attend them to St. Stephen's church on that day, where they proposed to pay their respects to the duke before they set out upon an expedition, which they pretended was to affift a friend, who had some differences with his neighbours in the country. They used other stratagems and pretexts for assembling, at the same place and time, all who they thought would join them when the blow was struck. Some prudential confiderations likewise mingled in their plan. The Midescribe at that time were afflicted with famine, and the conspirators proposed to give up the palaces of the most obnoxious of the duke's favourites, to be plundered by the people.

EARLY in the morning of St. Stephen's day, the three conspirators met in the church; and one of them, Giovanni Andrea, most devoutly prayed, after he had heard mass, before an image of St. Ambrofe, the tutelar faint of Milan. They. then took the stands they had pitched upon; and when the duke entered the church, Lampognano and Olgiato wounded him with their daggers, which were so short that they were concealed in their fleeves, in the throat, breast, and belly, as Viscenti did in the back; so that he instantly expired with the words, "Oh Lady save me!" The bye-standers, far from rejoicing at the tyrant's death, revenged it by killing Lampegnane and Visconti. Olgiate escaped, and for some time lurked about disguised like a friar; but being discovered, he fuffered death, under exquisite tortures, though he was no more than twenty-three years of age, with incredible resolution, comforting himself by repeating, from the Latin classics, verses, and fentiments suiting to his attempt and fate. The affaffination, however, was far from producing the effects the conspirators expected. Their cause was not backed by a fingle man, and the public feemed to have no fentiments but those of detestation for the murderers.

THE house of Medici was now, viz. in 1477, possessed A.D. of more power in Florence than it had ever been. Its branches 1477. and private alliances were numerous and well cemented, and State of Lorenzo seemed to possess the popular virtues of his an-the bouse of cestors. All the opposition which his sather had met with Medici. contributed to Lorenzo's greatness; for they who secretly hated and envied him durst not oppose, because they well Y 3 knew that in republics, especially in that of Florence, no forgiveness amongst factions; and they had seen m stances of it in the differences between the Medici a antagonists. This stourishing state of the house of encreased the aversion of the pope to it, and made solve, if possible, to ruin it. The archbishop of Pi was of the Medici samily, happening about this time the pope nominated Giacomo Salviati, a professed an mined enemy of the house of Medici, to be his si The Florentines remonstrated strongly against this nomi but finding all their efforts vain, they resused to sufviati to take possession of his new dignity.

Conspiracy
against it

THE pope ascribing this obstinacy to the influence house of Medici, set up against it that of Pazzi, the then in Florence for riches and authority. The head family was Facob Pazzi, who had received fignal honou the people; and though he had no children of his o a natural daughter, he had seven nephews, William, Renate, John, Andrew, Nicholas, and Galeatto. C Medici had, from a fagacious forelight of the rivall tween the two houses, given his niece Biancha to Pazzi, thereby hoping to cement the interest of the milies. But in proportion as that of Pazzi adva riches and popularity, Lorenzo de Medici grew the mo lous of their obtaining any share in the government; Jacob Pazzi and his nephews, notwithst anding their ric mained no more than private, though illustrious, cit Florence. Their rank, however, gave them a right present at popular assemblies; but the magistrates w fided there, paid little or no regard to their opinions. even went so far as to summon Francis Pazzi, who has to refide some time at Rome, to repair to Naples; as ing which plainly shewed they either were jealous of finess at Rome, or that they wanted to affront the P. John Pazzi, another of the nephews, having the daughter and heirefs of Giovanni Borromeo, a dil law happened between the daughter's husband and Be nephew, about the succession to the estate of Borren was now dead; and the cause was given in favour of phew by the judges, not quite agreeably to the print justice. The Pazzi had long been secretly exasperated the Medici; but as there was no disguising that this is fentence was procured by their influence, the Pazzi patience, and every where accused and reproached the dici for their injustice and partiality against their family was looked upon by Lorenzo as an open attack upon thority, and was far from producing any steps towards an accommodation. Giulian de Medici, who had less ambition, and more sentiments of justice, than his brother, often regretted the breach between the two samilies, and advised Lorenzo to moderate measures: but the latter, who, with all his judgment, was young and siery, continued still to carry it with a high hand towards the Pazzi.

FRANCIS PAZZI, the most considerable of all the by the page nephews for spirit, abilities, and wealth, was then a mer- and the chant, or rather a banker at Rome, where the vast estate he Pazzi. acquired, introduced him to the company and intimacy of the principal personages in that city; and he lived in the strictest friendship with Girolamo, the pope's son or nephew. gave him an opportunity of confulting about the ruin of the Medici family, which was equally obnoxious to Girolamo as to Pazzi, because the former, while their power subsisted, did not think himself secure in the possession of his estates. Nothing, however, but the deaths of Lorenzo and his brother could answer their purposes; and it was necessary to bring the pope and the king of Naples into their party. To fucceed in this, they applied to Salviati, the archbishop of Pija, who readily promised them his affistance. It was then determined, that Francis should repair to Florence, to bring Jacob Pazzi into their defign, while the other two should remain at Rome to keep the pope steady in their party. Francis could make little interest with his uncle; and Montesecco, the pope's general, was applied to second him. Montejecco disliked the office; but, overpersuaded by the archbishop, he at last undertook it, and, under pretence of recovering to Girolamo certain towns near Faenza, he took Florence in his way. this time the pope had fully approved of the horrid defign of the affassination, and had ordered his general to further it to the best of his power. Montesecco behaved with great address; pretending business with Lorenzo de Medici, he was surprised at his affability and politeness; but, devoted to the pope his master, he at last, in conjunction with Francis Pazzi, prevailed on Jacob to consent to the conspiracy, provided it was backed by the pope's army. Nothing was now wanting but the consent of the king of Naples, which was soon obtained. The whole plot was carried on with such profound diffimulation, that the Florentines admitted the archbishop into their city; and thro' his interest, which was very powerful, the conspiracy was greatly strengthened by the accession of several young noblemen of great families and interest. The better to cover their defigns, cardinal Riario, nephew to count Girolamo, came to Florence, where he hired a magnificent palace, in which the chief conspirators were concealed and held their Many of their deliberations proved abortive. confultations. from various causes; but at last they resolved, that the two brothers de Medici should be assassinated in the church of St. Raparata. Giovanni Battista, who was appointed to murder Lorenzo, refused the horrid office, which was therefore committed to Antonio of Volterra, and one Stephen, 2 school-master, but at the same time a priest; while Francis Pazzi and Bernardo Bandini undertook to murder Giulian, at the same time that the archbishop Salviati, and Poggio, another of the conspirators, were to seize the palace and force the fenators to come into their measures. The hour for the assaffination being arrived, Giulian de Medici, not coming a was expected to the church, Francis Pazzi and Bernardo, who were destined to murder him, went to hasten him, which they endeavoured to do, by the most tender expressions of friendship, even to the embracing him, that they might discover whether he had about him any private armour, and with fuch an opennels of behaviour, that Giulian lost all miltrust, and entered the church along with them, Lorenzo being already in the church. The first wound given to Gialian was by Bernardo, with a short dagger, in the breast, which proved mortal; but, tho' he almost immediately fell to the ground, Francis Pazzi threw himself upon the body, and gave it several stabs with such fury, that he even desperately wounded his own leg. The other two affaffins, who were destined to the murder of Lorenzo, attacked him; but he bravely stood upon his defence, and obliged the affassins to fly: they were however afterwards found, and put to a shameful death. In the mean while Lorenzo, and the friends whom he happened to have about his person, had barricadoed themselves in the vestry of the church; and Bernardo Bandini, aster killing Francis Neri, because he was a friend to the Medici family, ran about in search of Lorenzo to dispatch him; but in this he failed. The cardinal took refuge at the altar, where he was faved with the utmost difficulty from the rage of the people, by a guard which the senate sent him, and which escorted him to his palace. As to the archbishop, he went with some sugitive Perugians to the public palace; and leaving a party to secure the gates, he went up into the apartments of the gonfalonier, who was Cæsar Petrucci; but the archbishop's confusion was so great, that his design was soon known; and the senate being alarmed, he and Poggio, with two kinsmen who attended him, were seized, and the rest of his party, who had by this time entered the palace, were either killed or thrown alive from the palace-windows, out of which

Giulian Medici murdered.

Lorenzo

which the archbishop, the two Salviati, and Jacob Poggio, Punish. were immediately hanged. The conspirators, however, who ment and had been left below, had forced the guards and the gates of deaths of the palace; but could proceed no farther, the fenators and the conspitheir attendants making good the upper rooms. Francis rators; Pazzi's wound was so severe, that he could not, as he proposed, get on horseback to proclaim liberty to the people; but he prevailed on Jacob Pazzi to undertake that office. Faceb, at the head of about one hundred horse, accordingly fallied into the Great Square; but his success was very indifferent. The people, who had not been sensible of the loss of their liberty under the Medici, refused to join him: the senators pelted him with stones from the palace; and he himself, now old, infirm, and naturally unambitious, was perfuaded by his brother-in-law to retire, which he did, at the head of his troop, towards the Romagna.

LORENZO DE MEDICI was now greater than ever; and of the his enemies were subdued or dissipated, and his name was joy- Pazzi fafully proclaimed through every quarter of the city, by the mily. people who dragged Francis Pazzi out of his house, and hanged him up in company with the archbishop and his other confederates; a fate to which he submitted with invincible fortitude. Lorenzo's house was now the rendezvous of all the citizens, who offered to ferve him with their lives and fortunes. As to the rest of the samily of Pazzi, Jacob was taken in his flight, as likewise was Renate; and both of them. though the latter was innocent, were brought to Florence. where they were ignominiously executed, William Pazzi was confined, as were the rest of his kinsmen who remained alive: and the other chiefs, who had been feized, were put to death. After this, the funerals of Giulian de Medici, who left a posthumous fon of his own name, were magnificently celebrated. All this time a body of troops, under Lorenzo de Castello, in the vale of Tevere, and another under Giovanni Francisco Tolenting, in the Romagna, both of them in the pay of the pope and the king of Naples, were advancing in full march towards Florence, to support the conspirators; but hearing of their defeat, they returned.

THE miscarriage of this detestable conspiracy served only Tuscany to increase the rancour of the pope against the Florentines; invaded by and both he and the king of Naples ordered their generals to the pope. march their armies into Tuscany, but publicly to declare, that they had no other enemy for their object than Lorenzo de Medici. Upon this, Lorenzo summoned a meeting of the nobility and chief citizens, to the number of three hundred, where he pronounced a speech in vindication of his own and his his family's conduct, that, if it has not been embellished by Machiavel², shews him to have been one of the greatest orators that ever lived. Speaking of the late attempt against Speech of himself, "Where parricides, says he, and assassins are secure, " the Medici meet their murderers." He then modestly re-Lorenzo deMedici. counts the virtues of his predecessors, and exposes the deligns of his enemies, who had stirred up the pope and the king of Naples against their country; and concludes in the following noble manner: " This war, they fay, is made against me " and my family; I wish to God it were true: then the reee medy were both ready and certain; for I will never be so bad 46 a citizen as to value more my own fafety than your danger: 66 much rather should I quench your flames with my own ruin; but, because injuries done by the mighty are always " covered with some more seemly pretence, they have chosen "this veil to call over their present injustice: but if you "think otherwise, I am in your hands; you may support, or " you may suppress me, you, my fathers, you, my defenders; " for whatever you shall command, I shall readily obey: nor "will I refuse, if you shall think fit, to end this war with " my own, which was begun with my brother's, blood."

THE citizens answered him with tears of affection; and one, who was their spokesman, by their order, assured him, Answered. That, with the same readiness and affection with which they had revenged his brother and defended him, they would still preserve his life and reputation; nor should he lose either till they had lost their country. A guard to be maintained by the public was then voted, and raifed, for his person; and levies of men and money were every where made through their flate, to defend them from the impending storm. IT cannot be denied, that the conduct of the Florentines on fibe Flo-this occasion was great and manly, and such as scarcely can be paralleled in a Roman catholic state. The pope had exrgainst the communicated them; but they were so far from regarding his censures, that they forced their priests to perform divine ser-They summoned before them all the prelates under their dominion, enjoining them to pay no regard to the pope, from whom they appealed to the next general council; and they published a manifesto against him, in which they reproached him as being the very worst of tyrants and parricides, for having given fanction to murderers in a church, and during the very celebration of the holy facrament. In short, none of the German reformers afterwards behaved with more spirit against the see of Rome, than the Florentines did on this occasion. The pope, on the other hand, had nothing to oppose against those dreadful allegations, but the stale arguments of the independency of the ecclesiastic upon the civil power, and the illegality of the latter imprisoning cardinals, hanging archbishops, and quartering priests. But, notwithstanding all the just causes of provocation which the Florentines had received from the pope, they delivered up to him the cardinal, because it appeared he had been employed only as a blind, and had not been active in the conspiracy; for, if he had, it is more than probable he would have undergone the fate of the archbishop.

Pirmness ope.

THE combined army of the pope and the king of Naples The war had advanced by the way of Sienna to Chianti, the army of profecuted the church being commanded by Frederick count of Urbino. and that of Naples by Alphonso, the eldest son of Ferdinand duke of Calabria. Their first enterprize was against Castiglione, belonging to the Florentines, which they took, after a flege of forty days. The truth is, the Florentines had little, at this time, to depend upon but their own courage and spirit. The Milanese government was then unsettled, and in the hands of the young duke's mother, who was at variance with all her husband's relations; but, in virtue of the late confederacy, the fent the Florentines some affishance; which the republic of Venice, the other party, declined to do, on pretence that the quarrel was of a private nature. Notwithstanding this disappointment, the Florentine army, under Hercules marguis of Ferrara, took the field, and would have destroyed their enemies, who befieged and took Monte S. Sovino in the Arezzan, had it not been for the incapacity or treachery of their general, who granted them a truce for some days. After this, both armies retired to winter-quarters.

THE pope and the king of Naples, perceiving the Florentines Revolutio supported by the dutches of Milan, employed the rebel princes in the Mi of the Sforza family, and the Adorni, to shake off the Mi-lanele. lanese yoke; whilst Fregoso, by savour of the dutchess, who was unable to recover the city for her son, got possession of it, and drove from thence the Sforzi and S. Severino, a Neapolitan general of great reputation, who, putting himself at the head of some troops, ravaged the territories of Pisa, and advanced almost to the gates of that city; and thus the Florentines, in the spring, found themselves oppressed by the confederate army on the fide of Sienna, and by S. Severino on that of Pifa. It was, at the same time, with the utmost difficulty that they could keep the Lucquese faithful to their engagements. But the Venetians having lately made peace with the Turks, the Florentines took into their pay Charles, Brachio's son, and count Deiphobo, Jacob Picinino's son. Those two generals, bringing with them a body of mercenaries, forced S. Severing to defift from his attempt upon Pifa, and recovered all the places he had feized. But the animolities which had subsisted between their grandfathers broke out afresh, which obliged the Florentines to put them upon separate services. The body under Deiphobo remained at Poggiobonzi; that under Charles marched against Perugia; while Nicholas Vitelli, with the third party, attempted to retake Citta di Castelle. Death of Charles died in the career of his victories and successes, and was succeeded by Robert of Rimini; and all that Vitelli could do was to spoil the open country about Citta di Castello. The death of Charles gave such spirits to the pope's army, that they attacked that under Robert near the lake of Perugia, an> ciently that of Thrasymene, (on the very spot where Hannibal beat the Roman army under Flaminius) but were defeated. This advantage was counterballanced by a mutiny of their troops at Poggiobonzi, which obliged the Florentines to dismis the marguis of Ferrara from their service. Upon this, Al-

Charles Brachio.

Progress of phonso duke of Calabria, Ferdinand's eldest son, attacked and the duke of totally routed their army, which left all their ammunition, Calabria. carriages, artillery, and baggage, a prey to the enemy; for, as Machiavel b observes, in those days the motion of one horse, either to retreat or charge, gave defeat or victory. A pestilence, which at that time raged in Fiorence, had driven most of its inhabitants into the country; while the council of ten was obliged to recal the army under Robert, which was then besieging Perugia, to the defence of their capital; and it encamped at S. Cassiano, within eighteen miles of Florence. This gave the duke of Calabria an opportunity of extending his conquests on the side of Sienna. He took Poggiobonzi, View. and Certaldo; and laid fiege to the strong castle of Colle, which, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Florentine army to relieve it, yielded on the 13th of November; on which both armies went into winter-quarters.

A truce for tbree wonths.

THE state of affairs in Italy, at this time, induced the pope and the king of Naples to offer the Florentines a truce for three months, which was accepted. This respite enabled the Florentines the more coolly to reflect on their own disagreeable They perceived they had nothing to trust to, either from Venice or Milan; and that their victorious enemies would probably, next year, be at the gates of their city. Each blamed the other: but the great charge of misconduct lay against Lorenzo de Medici; and one of the Florentines, in a public affembly, bluntly told him, that he must, some way or other, think of giving them peace. Lorenzo, one of the wisest patriots any state ever had, wanted no inducement to follow this counsel; and after many deliberations with his friends, in which they resolved not to trust the pope, he came to the generous resolution of going in person to Naples, to treat of an accommodation. Leaving the charge of affairs in the city to Thomas Soderini, then gonfalonier of justice, he repaired, without any public character, and without acquainting the senate, to Pisa; from whence he sent them letters, informing them of his intention, which they answered by Negociation fending him full powers to treat, as the ambassador of the of Lorenpeople of Florence, with the Neapolitan king. The command-20. ing presence of Lorenzo, the force of his reasoning and eloquence, and the openness of his manner, with a thousand other circumstances that characterise a great and wise man, did more than an age of negociation could have effected. Ferdinand, now old and experienced in the arts of government, no fooner heard him speak of the interests of Italy, and of her several states and potentates, than he was brought over to his fentiments, and refolved, at any rate, to make him his friend. Notwithstanding this, Ferdinand could not lay aside his insidious habits. He protracted the negociation, that he might see the turn which affairs might take in Florence during the absence of Lorenzo, who had many enemies there. But at last a league, offensive and defensive, was concluded between the king and the Florentines; and on the 6th of March, 1479, Lorenzo set out on his return to Tuscany.

MACHIAVEL, book viii.

THE amazing fagacity that gave rife to this negociation, His bigh the abilities with which it was conducted, and the fuccess that merit in attended it, form an extraordinary period in civil history, and concluding were worthy the genius of the first man in the Florentine state, the same. Lorenzo had the glory and fatisfaction to fee his labours rewarded by the gratitude of his country, in the reception he met with at his return, and in the extinction of party-spirit, which now centered in the admiration of his virtues. days after his arrival, the articles of the offensive and defenfive league were proclaimed. By them the king was to dispose of the places he had taken from the Florentines as he pleased. The Pazzi, who had been imprisoned, were to be freed; and the duke of Calabria was to receive from the Florentines a subfidy for a certain time. The Venetians and the pope complained of the difrespect shewn them by this peace, as they neither had been invited to the negociation, nor were they included in the terms. They expressed their resentment in fuch a manner, that the Florentines, to prevent the confequences, probably by Lorenzo's advice, constituted their supreme council of seventy citizens, who were invested with the highest powers in government. This council ratified the peace with Ferdinand, and nominated ambassadors to go to Rome; but they perceived, through various accidents, that they had still great difficulties to encounter.

Charaster

THE dutchess of Milan had been obliged to resign that of Lewis government to Lewis the Moor, so called from his swarthy the Moor. complexion, brother to the late duke, one of the most extraordinary characters in history. Though politic and penetrating, he was irrefolute and timid, and fear generally determined him to the most dangerous courses. Serazana was taken from the Florentines by Fregoso the Genoese, who made all the garrison prisoners; and, what was more afflicting than all to the Florentines, the duke of Calabria still lay on their confines with his army, and not only totally disclaimed the late peace, but endeavoured to possess Sienna, as the first step towards his becoming master of all Tuscany. It is difficult to fay what the consequences might have been, had not the Turks, who had been repulsed before Rhodes, made a descent " upon Italy, and, after ravaging the sea-coasts, taken Otranto, the most convenient port for them in all the kingdom of Naples, and fortified it, with a view of continuing their con-This alarming event delivered Tuscany from the duke of Calabria's ambition; for he was obliged to return with his army to Naples; and the pope now declared himself willing to treat of an accommodation with the Florentines, notwithstanding all the provocations he had received from them. They, on the other hand, not standing on forms where essentials were preserved, named twelve deputies to go to Rome; where, after a great variety of submissions on their part, and of haughtiness on that of his holiness, the pope gave them his benediction, and ratified the peace. Notwithstanding that, he infifted upon the Florentines maintaining fifteen armed gallies against the Turks. This demand, which the Florestines complained heavily of, was afterwards mitigated by the address of Guido Antonio Vespucci: and thus the Florentina reconciled to were placed in a fituation the most desirable of any they had known for many years.

Discontent of the duke of Calabria.

rentines the pope.

The Flo-

A peace.

THEIR first care was to obtain restitution of the towns. that had been taken from them by the duke of Calabria, and which had been left to the disposal of Ferdinand, but were now in the hands of the Siennese. Ferdinand was warmly plied by the Florentines to refift their importunities, because he might have thereby kindled a new war in Italy, which might have deprived him of the assistance he expected against the Turks. The towns were reffored; by which, favs Machiavel b, it apprears, that neither treaties nor oatns, but necessity, makes princes honest. Fortune thus reconding the virtues and abilities of Lorenzo, he was in his own country as great and glorious as a good citizen could with to be; and even accidents were now configured as the effects of his policy.

THE furrender of Otranto foon after by the Turks, the The Mobile it quieted the fears, renewed the differences of the Hallion depoints princes and states. The Tenetians had pretentions upon the Ferrarese; and gaining the pope to their fide, they made S. Severino their general. The Florentines placed Conflunce. the lord of Pelaro, at the head of their army, and that of the Milanese was commanded by Frederick of Urbino. The pope not having declared himself, Ferdinand ordered the duke of Ca'abria to demand a passage for his troops through his dominions, for the affiftance of the marquis of Ferral a, which was denied. The Florentines joining with Perdinand, confidered this denial as a commencement of holilities on the pope's part, and took the field against him. The duke of Calabria's troops, affished by the family of Colonna, carried their incursions to the gates of Rome, and Nicholas Vitelli, by the affistance of the Florentines, recovered Citta di Callello, from the pope's governor. His holiness being thus strategied on every fide, took into his pay Robert of Rimini, whole the duke of great reputation and experience gave so much spirit to the Calabria. Romans, that they marched out of Rome, and obliged the duke of Calabria to come to a battle. The event was glossous for his holiness, or rather for his general. The hattle was more bloody than any that had been fought in Italy for fifty years before, for almost one thousand men were killed on both fides; but at last the Neapolitan; were en unity the feated, and the duke of Calabria himself must have been taken prisoner, had he not been saved by some Turks, who had entered into his service after the Sevencer of Otranto. A few days after, Robert of Rimini, who is filled the Magnifront, died; and his holiness, to testify his grave son to a general who had served him to falenfully, after youry him a magnificent burial, fent no necessary, course Corolano, et, deprive his infant fon of his interitance of Pan and I has Pla rentines, on this occasion, generally interplate in factor of the infant and his macher; and the pope was willow by them, not only in that attempt, but it accords that the had formed against Citta de Cafeir. Tet au zu. ... wie e weite in its

^{*} Martinery was in.

the Ferrarese, where the Venetians took Figurola from the marquis of Ferrara, and must have taken Ferrara itself, had not Ferdinand and the Florentines threatened the pope with the authority of a general council which the emperor had then convoked at Basil. His holiness, obliged to give way to necessity, at last sent ambassadors to Naples, where a league, or rather a truce, for five years was concluded upon, between him, Ferdinand, Lewis the Moor, and the Florentines, and the pope fignified his pleasure to the Venetians, that they should desist from their war in Ferrara.

Alarming power of tians.

THE Venetians, at that time, were so excessively powerful, as to become formidable to the other states of Italy. the Vene- defeated both the Milanese and the Neapolitan troops, that had been fent to the affiftance of the marquis of Ferrara, and were actually befreging Ferrara itself, when Lorenzo de Medici, the pope's legate, and the other allies of the Florentines, affembled at Cremona, to confult about doing fomething decifive against the Venetians. At first it was proposed, that Lewis should give them a diversion in their own country, which he declined doing; and then they refolved to march and attack the Venetians before Ferrara. It was, however, judged expedient to begin with destroying the Venetian fleet, which they effectually did. The land-army of the Venetians confished of two thousand two hundred men at arms, and six thousand foot; that of the Florentines, and their allies, of four thousand men at arms, and eight thousand foot (B). The Venetians, not daunted with this great superiority of numbers, fent S. Severino across the Adda, where he proclaimed the young duke and his mother the fovereigns of Milan, upder the walls of that city. This measure produced no commotion in Milan, and exasperated Lewis so much, that be now agreed to the diversion he had rejected before, and is

A league aga:n/t them.

> (B) It may be here necessary to explain one circumstance to the reader, which may have puzzled him in the course of this history, in which he sees the number of horse in armies commonly, superior to those of foot. This was owing to the pride of the Italian noblemen and gentlemen, who generally ferved on horseback, and were themselves attended by a number of attendants on horseback. who were all of them reckoned to be foldiers, tho' perhaps not' above two or three hundred out of one thousand were properly: armed for the field. But a distinction amongst the cavalry now prevailed. Men at arms were men completely armed who ferved on horfeback, and their attendants, who are called light horse, are seldom mentioned. This distinction, the new in Italy, was very ancient in Frances unction with the duke of Calabria, he fell into the Berase, the Bressan, and the Veronese, where they destroyed he open country; and it was with difficulty that S. Seve-, the Venetian general, could prevent their becoming ters of the cities. This happened in the year 1483. OTHING now but diffention amongst themselves, could It is prevented the allies from driving the Venetians out of broken. bardy. But the interests of the duke of Calabria and ns the Moor, became then incompatible. John Galeazzo, new to Lewis and the true duke of Milan, had married duke of Calabria's daughter: and Gonzaga, the marquis Mantua, who had always kept them in friendship, being dead, the duke infifted upon Lewis putting his fon-inin possession of his inheritance, hoping that as Galeazzo but a weak prince, he himself would succeed Lewis as iniferator of that duchy. This demand made Levis fall from the confederacy, and threw him into the arms of Venetians, with whom he made a peace in August 1484. A peace? he articles of it, the Venetians were restored to the possesof all the towns taken from them, which had been put the hands of Lewis, while they retained all they had n from the marguis of Ferrara. It was in vain for the intines and their allies to remonstrate against this treaty. y stood in need of peace, and they were obliged to accede . In the mean while, the allies had agreed with his ness to withdraw all assistance from Vitelli, who remained offession of Citta di Castello, which was besieged by his es: but they were defeated by Vitelli, with whom his ness was obliged to come to a compromise. The pope ijoined the Ursmi against the Colonnas, who favoured the politans. But at last each party beat the other into peace, her being able to continue the war. HE Florentines all this time had employed Antonio de The Flo-retians to lie with some troops near Serazana, in hopes of rentines at ag an opportunity to retake that city. Nothing how-war with but slight skirmishes passed on either side. It may there-the Genobe said, that all Italy was at this time in a state of tran-ele. lity; a circumstance so disagreeable to his holiness, that take his heart. His death filled all Rome with uproar and d, occasioned by the differences between the families of it and Colonna, and count Girolamo possessed himself of castle of S. Angelo, which may be considered as the cita-if Rome. He, however, being desirous to oblige the next retired to his own estates; and cardinal Cibo, who the name of Innocent VIII. succeeded to the popedom, restored the tranquillity of Rome.

 ${oldsymbol{z}}$

IOD. HIST. VOL. XXXVI.

THE

They be-

THE Florentines still continued very uneasy under the loss of fiege Pie- Serazana, and the more so, as it had been taken from them tra Santa, by Fregoso, a private Genoese. They therefore made vigorous preparations for retaking it; upon which Fregolo yielded up the possession of it to the proprietors of the bank of St. George, who then possessed almost all the territories belonging to the Genoele, without the walls of their city. By this cession the Flarentines had no pretext for making war against the Geneele as a community; and they yet could have no hopes of succeeding in the recovery of Serazana, without taking Pietra Santa, a town belonging to the Genoese. That they might have a good colour for a breach, they ordered a great quantity of provisions, under a very slight convoy, to be sent from Pife to their army before Serazana, by the way of Pietra Senta. That garrison could not resist the bait: they sallied out, and easily became masters of the plunder. Upon this the Florestine army abandoned the fiege of Serazana, and undertook that of Pietra Santa; and the war thus becoming general between them and the Genoese, the fleet of the latter took and burnt the fortress of Vada, and ravaged the territory of Val-Their ravages were repressed by Buongianni Gianty. liazzi, a Florentine officer, who was sent with a party of horse against them. The Genoese navy, however, made an attempt upon Leghorn, a place which now began to make a figure in Tuscany, from whence it was repulsed with los, though they had been at vast expence in engineering to reduce it.

and at last take it.

THE flege of Pietra Santa still went on; but so remiss was the Florentine army in its discipline, that they were surprised by a fally from the belieged, and driven from their works to the distance of four miles from the town. There they deliberated about abandoning the fiege, and retiring into winter quarters. This news coming to Florence, filled the whole city with indignation. Antonio Pucci and Bernardo del Nero, two of the most respectable citizens in Florence were immediately dispatched with a large sum of money to remonstrate to the army, which it feems was numerous and well appoint-The shame of being baffled before so inconfiderable 2 place, joined to the good conduct of the new commissaries, especially Antonio Pucci, was so successful that the soldiers flormed the works they had loft before, but with the lofs of their general Marciano; and the town itself, perceiving their resolution, proposed a capitulation. To give the more honour to the desence made by the besiegers, Lorenzo de Medici came in person to the Florentine camp, and in a few days after the castle, as well as the town, was surrendered.

the Florentines some of their best troops and officers, and ngst the latter Antonio Pucci, who died through the unsome heats of the country during the autumn season.

HE Lucquese did not fail to claim from the Florentines It is claima Santa, as a place that had formerly belonged to their ed by the The Florentines, without denying that fact, told Lucquese.

that before they gave it up, they must be satisfied for aft lost of blood and treasure which the reduction of the : had cost them, and a treaty of peace being now set not by the pope, they were not fure whether they might be obliged to restore the town to the Genoese. In those cations the winter past, and all the next spring. Lorenzo edici was so afflicted with an hereditary gout, that he could o business, and none could be done by the Florentines This delayed the fiege of Serazana: and the out him. tion of the duke of Calabria threw fresh obstacles in their

The city of Aquila was so little dependent on the n of Naples, that though it lay in that kingdom, it t be faid to have been free. The duke of Calabria being e neighbourhood with his troops, under pretence of bu- Revolution

, trepanned the count of Montorio, who had the greatest in Aquila. in Aquila, into his power, and fent him prisoner to es, in hopes of reducing Aquila to an absolute subjection at crown. The Aquilians upon this flew to arms, and nly put to death the king's commissary, and several of 'nand's friends in that city, but erected the papal banners, nvited the pope to take them under his protection. His ess greedily accepted of the invitation; andtaking into his . Severino, who had been dismissed from the Milanese serall the friends of count Montorio, and many of the Nean barons, declared in his favour. Ferdinand applied to Norentines for assistance; and the they were extremely from either entering into a war with the holy see, or cuting the advantages they had obtained over the Geyet they fent an army to his affistance, by which Alremained master of the field against his holiness, and is other enemies. At last, the Spaniards offering their A peace. ation, a peace was concluded, by which all Italy was more restored to its tranquilltiy, the Geneose alone beoxcluded, for having shaken off the yoke of Milan, and ming the Florentine possessions.

HE punctuality with which the Florentines had fulfilled engagements with Ferdinand, gave them vast credit the pope, who, during the war with the Neapolitans, had The pope betrayed by his general S. Severino, and he publickly favours sed, that he would do every thing in his power to ferve the Flo-

 \mathbf{Z}_{2}

and rentines.

and oblige them. This being reported to Lorenzo de Medici. he omitted nothing that could cement or improve the growing friendship, and actually gave one of his daughters in marriage to Francis, son to the pope, who had been married before he was exalted to the popedom. From that time the interests of Florence and the holy see became the same, as Lorenzo had agreed to every thing proposed for the advancement of his fon-in-law in Italy. The pope, on the other hand, infifted strongly with the Genoese that they should restore Serazana to the Florentines, as holding it from an iniquitous title derived from Fregoso. The Genoese were so far from paying regard to the remonstrances of his holiness. that they fitted out a fleet of gallies, then landed three thoufand foot at Serazanella, and after taking and plundering the town, and the neighbouring places, all which belonged to the Florentines, they planted artillery against the casse. This being done while a truce was fubliffing under the pone's mediation, the Florentines complained loudly of it at Rome. but ordered their general Virginio Orsini at Pisa, to draw their troops together. They then fent ambassadors to require aid from their allies. But Ferdinand excused himself because of his war with the Turks, and Lewis of Milan trifled with them; fo that they received none. Depending, therefore, on themselves alone, they appointed James Guicciardini and Peter Vittori, to command against the Genoese, who still pressed the citadel of Serazanella, and lay encamped on the five Magra. A battle quickly enfued, in which the Genoese were intirely deseated; and Lorenzo de Medici arriving in the Fhrentine camp, Serazana itself was belieged and taken, after an obstinate resistance, by the Florentines.

Ewents

Serazana taken.

DURING those transactions on the Magra, Lewis Sforza, in Romag- under pretence of fending fome troops to the affiltance of the Florentines, fent them to support an insurrection which he privately procured to be made in Genoa, by which that city once more fell into the hands of the Milanele. About the same time the Venetians were defeated near Trent by the Germans, and their general S. Severino was killed. But the Venetians foon made a peace, by which they gained more than all they had lost by war. The connections between the pope and Lorenzo de Medici grew every day stronger; for the latter persuaded Boccalino of Olmo, in the marquiface of Ancona, to restore that town to his holiness, after making it rebel. Beccaling afterwards lived in splendor at Florence, from whence he removed to Milan, where he was put to = death by Lewis Sforza. In the Romagna, Francis del Orfo 'assassinated count Girolamo in his own house, and made his wife - wife and children prisoners, but could not master the citadel. The countess offered to prevail with the governor to surrender it, and the conspirators'accordingly suffered her to enter it, detaining her children as pledges. But far from performing her promise, the threatened the governor and all the garrison with death if they did not make a vigorous desence, and flighted all the menaces of the conspirators against her chil-This resolute conduct, and the approach of some troops to her affistance from Milan, made the conspirators Ay with all their effects to Citta di Castello; but the countess pursued them and amply revenged her husband's death. Florentines were no farther concerned in this incident, than as it gave them an opportunity of recovering the castle of Piancaldi, which had been usurped from them by the count.

THE Florentines were more interested in another tragical event, but of a more different nature, which at the same time happened near Forli. Galeotto, lord of Faenza, was married to the daughter of John Bentivoglio of Bologna, and by her had a fon called Afterre. The lady conceived fo insolerable an aversion to her husband, that she resolved to have him murdered, and she brought her father into the same unnatural design, in hopes of becoming master of Faenza after his fon-in law's death. She counterfeited fickness, and her suspand coming to visit her, the affassins rushed out and The Flo-New him, Upon this, the took refuge with her fon in the rentines castle, while Bentivoglio, and one Bergamino, a Milanese become the officer, took possession of Faenza, where there happened to adminirefide at the time Antonio Boscoli, a Florentine commissary. firators of But while the state of affairs in Faenza was unsettled, the Faenza. country people took arms, and breaking into the town killed Bergamino, made Bentivoglio prisoner, and recommended the government of the state, and young Ajlorre, to Boscoli. Florentines readily undertook the charge, but fet at liberty Bentivoglio and his daughter, who had continued blocked up in the citadel.

FLORENCE was now at a very high pitch of happi- State of ness and prosperity. The Venetians were in no condition to Florence. hurt her; Lewis Sforza had no inclination, nor was it his The pope and the king of Naples were her friends: and the might have been faid to have possessed the ballance of power in Italy. Her people were rich, powerful, united, and flourishing in learning, arts, and sciences, beyond perhaps what any people ever were, excepting the Athenians. All this prosperity was owing to the wildom and virtue of a private citizen, Lorenzo de Medici. For some years the tranquillity of his country was such, that it afforded no events proper for history to record, unless we mention as such, the prodigious encouragement given by the Florentines, after Lorenzo's example, to men of learning and genius, who filled their country during this happy interval with writings and works, that will ever be the admiration of mankind. Lorenzo, however, though honoured with the appellation of the father of the muses, did not forget his own family. He married his eldest son to Alphonsima, daughter to the chevalier Orsini. Though his fecond fon John, afterwards the famous pope Leo X. was not above thirteen years of age, yet he procured for him the dignity of cardinal; but his third fon was too young for any provision. He had four daughters; one of them was married to James Salvrati, another to Francis Cib, a third to Peter Ridolphi, all of them of great houses; and he would have given the fourth in marriage to James Medici, had she not died.

SUCH was the happy state of Florence and the Medici family in 1492, when Lorenzo de Medici, worn out by a complication of distempers which settled in his stomach, died, aged no more than forty-four years. For his character we mult, in a great measure, refer to those we have drawn of his illustrious predecessors, whom he resembled in all their public and private virtues; but he feems, in progress of time, to have exceeded them in personal accomplishments. owed, as we have feen, his life to his valour, and he had a turn for military affairs, which was of infinite service to his country, though peace was the darling object of all his mea-The commerce of Europe began, during his time, to run into new channels, and more expensive manners prevailing in life. Lorenzo found that he was imposed upon by his factors, who lived like princes, and he therefore narrowed his mercantile dealings, and laid out the money he was master of in territorial acquifitions, within the state of Flarence, as being the most likely to give permanency to his family. He not only loved and rewarded, above any prince of his age, the fine arts, but practifed them in his own person-According to Machiavel, compositions of his arestill extant, that prove him to have been both a poet and a critic. He was a good judge of architecture, which in his time was commonly combined with painting, and of music. He founded the university of Pisa, to which he brought the most learned and ingenious men in Italy. He built near to Florence of Loren- He is faid to have been more amorous than was confiftent zo de Me- with the first practice of virtue, and like Scipio, Lilius, and other

Death and a monastery for father Moriane, who was an excellent character preacher.

other great men of antiquity, to have unbent his more ferious hours with juvenile recreations; so that two souls seemed to relide in his body, for he sometimes made himself one of his. own children. Though he had no opinion of distant conquests, yet he fortified Florence against invasion from abroad, not only by adding to the strength as well as the beauty of the city, but by putting his friends into the government of those states and places, that were in a manner the keys of the republic. He kept in his own hands the administration of Faenza; and, by his interest, the Baglioni governed in Perugia, and the Vitelli in Citta di Castello. To amuse his busy pragmatical countrymen, as well as to render Florence more populous and frequented, he was perperually exhibiting public justs, tournaments, plays, entertainments, and other diversions, which had a wonderful effect upon the minds of the people, and reconciled them, in a great measure, to that aristocracy of which they were naturally so jealous. As Italy was then the country of learned princes and nobility, Florence and Lorenzo became the residence of all who cultivated, practifed, or studied the fine arts: and the famous Pico. count of Mirandola, after travelling through all Europe, chose to fix there.

LORENZO's fortune, in some respects, was equal to his merit. Several attempts, besides that of the Pazzi, were made upon his life; but all of them were deseated, and the assassins punished. The most distant princes were struck with reverence and esteem for his person and virtues; witness the corsespondence he kept up with Matthias, king of Hungary, the ambassadors and presents he received from the reigning emperors of the Turks, one of whom delivered up to him the murderer of his brother Bernarda Bandini, who had taken refuge amongst the insidels. His palace was the center of unity for all Italy; and by his wonderful address, he broughtit to a state of tranquillity, which it had not known for some ages before. Upon his death, all the Italian states and princes sent compliments of condolence by their ambassadors to Flatence.

By the death of Lorenzo de Medici, which was succeeded Succeeded by that of pope Innocent VIII. the ballance of power in Italy by his son was again destroyed. Lorenzo was succeeded by his son Pe-Pater. ter; but he was fat from being qualified, either by age or abilities, for maintaining his father's system. Both his wise and mother were of the Orsini family, and he resigned himself intirely to the direction of his kinsman Virginio Orsini, who persuaded him to strengthen his connections with the court of Naples; a measure which gave such umbrage to

 \mathbf{Z}_{4}

Livis

Lewis Sforza, that it produced the most dismal calamities to Italy.

Borgia by the name of Alexander VI.

INNOCENT VIII. was succeeded by Roderigo Borgia, chosen pope a Spaniard, who called himself Alexander VI. a name that ever fince has been another title for all manner of impiety, impurity, cruelty, and wickedness. He mounted the name throne by open fimony, and was even above the practice of hypocrify in his vices. At the same time he was cunning and fagacious in finding out refources under all difficulties.

As the great strength of Italy now lay in an union, Starze proposed that the ambassadors of all her princes should prefent themselves in one day, as the members of one body, to make their usual congratulations upon the pope's accession, and that one should harangue him in the name of all the Peter, and the bishop of Arezzo, had been named ambassadors from the Florentines, and both of them designed to make a great figure; the former by the magnificence of his dress, equipages, and attendance; the other, by the speech he intended to make. They therefore privately prevailed on Ferdinand, who had approved of Sfezz's scheme, to oppose it, which he did, but at the same time named his advisers. This increased Sforza's suspicions. Cibo, who was the natural son of the last pope, and brother-in-law to Peter, lived then at Florence, and was persuaded to sell the castles of Anguillara, Cervetri, and some others, which he held in the neighbourhood of Rome, to Virginia Orlini, whom they intended should be a bridle upon the pope. Alexander, who had destined the crown of Naples for one of his own family, declared that the bargain was null, because those castles were fiefs of the holy see; and he was backed in his resentments by Sforza, who remonstrated to Peter de Medici the impolinc step he had taken, and pressed Ferdinand to compromise mate s with his holiness. Notwithstanding this, Virginio took possession of the castles, at the secret instigation of Ferdinand himfelf.

Peter differs with Sforza.

SFORZA was penetrating enough to perceive how strong the connections were between Peter and Ferdinand; and he endeavoured, but in vain, to break them, that be might preserve Florence still for his friend. He had usurped the power of his nephew, fon in-law to the duke of Calabria, who, with his daughter the dutchess of Milan, made no secret of their fentiments, and that the young prince and his family were in danger from the practices of his uncle. Sfarza, at the same time, was sensible that he was hated by the people a of Milan, and that the new alliance was necessary for his in lasety. He applied to the Venetians, who appeared cautions ickward; and to the pope, whose haughty spirit had exasperated by the court of Naples resuling to give their natural daughter in marriage to one of his fons, with sterritory in Naples for her portion. The Venetians, at serceiving the pope to be irreconcileable to Ferdinand, 33 came into the confederacy proposed by Sforza; the ad object of which was to dispossel's Virginio of his ac-Peter de Medici and the duke of Calabria could by the affiftance of the Colonnas and the Orfini, have I this confederacy in pieces, had they not been restrained z caution of old Ferdinand. In consideration of this, f the uncertainty of the continuance of the friendship en the pope and the Venetians, and his own dangerous ion, Sforza had recourse to the desperate expedient of ng Charles VIII. king of France, to invade the king-who inof Naples, under the title of the Anjouvin princes, which vites een made over to him. This title, it must be acknow- Charles of i, was plaufible. Charles was a weak, giddy, young France in-, both in body and mind; but had ambition, and a cou- to Italy. hat well fuited with the proposed expedition, from which is dissuaded by his ablest counsellors; but upon Sforza's ling to supply him with money, he undertook it. this negociation it is hard to fay which was most absurd, Negociaundust of Charles, or that of Sforza, who, blinded by tions on ars, invited the most powerful prince then in Europe that head. taly. Ferdinand seemed to dissemble his apprehensions; e was dreadfully alarmed. He endeavoured, by his amlors at the court of France, where they were treating of ch between his grand-daughter (who was cousin-german arles) and the young king of Scotland, to divert Charles his resolution, by even offering Charles an annual sub-He endeavoured to compromise affairs with the pope, to remove all Sforza's jealousies. He succeeded so far the pope, that, after making great facrifices both of ur and interest, the Venetian and Milanese troops, raised insequence of the late treaty, were dismissed. By this Sforza, either from natural dissimulation, or inward iction, expressed his apprehensions that he had gone too and promised Peter de Medici, that he would prevent the quences of the invalion. But it was now too late; for kes, having taken all measures that could secure his sucby alliances and negociations with the great powers of pe, required from the Florentine ambassadors a categorical er, whether their state would give his army a passage agh their dominions; and, upon their evading the queltion, tion, he threatened to banish all the Florentine merchants out of France, if it was not instantly answered.

Death of king of Naples.

PETER DE MEDICI, at first, endeavoured to bring Ferdinand Ferdinand to consent that he should yield to Charles; but Ferdinand remained inflexible on that head, and he died in the beginning of the year 1494. His fon Alphonfo, duke of Calabria, though possessed of all Ferdinand's faults of cruelty. oppression, and treachery, was inferior to him in address and temper. He perceived that the pope was exasperated by the difficulties he met with at home from the Florentine and Neepolitan factions, now in the French interest; but he brought him over, by making him a present of thirty thousand ducats, and by providing in the most extravagant manner for his three fons, one of whom was the famous Casar Borgia. The French king, on the other hand, without minding the intrigue of Italy, intimated to the Florentines, and the other Italian states, his intention of marching towards Naples. fon to the regent of Scotland, was at the head of this embassy; and when the ambassadors came to Florence, they put both the Florentines and Peter de Medici in mind of the infinite obligations they lay under to the crown of France. hitherto had the address to avoid giving the French court any positive answer; but he found the Florentines, in general, very averse from taking upon themselves to oppose the French Peter's influence, however, was so great, that the ambassadors were dismissed without any positive answer. THAT excellent historian Guicciardini a, informs us, as he

Designs of Pcter.

favs, from good authority, that Peter had formed a delign, by Alphonfo's affiltance, of intirely changing the Florentine government, by making himself prince or duke of that city. It is certain, that his father had no favourable opinion of his fon's capacity b; and that about this time two of his near relations, Lorenzo and Giovanni de Medici, men of great pro-Conspiracy perty, had entered into a correspondence with the French king and Sforza, for taking from him his power in the state, where all public offices were filled up by his appointment, and no measure could be concluded without his approbation. The defign was discovered; but all the censure the conspirators received was a flight confinement to their own houses, though it was with difficulty that Peter was restrained from taking a much severer revenge. This discovery served only to render him the more irreconcileable to Sforza, whom he confidered as author of the plot, and confirmed him the more is the ao ainst bim defeuted.

> * Guicciardini, book i. • Annotatione in margine fatte da Thomaso Porcacchi. Guicciardini, libro primo.

res he had proposed. A peremptory but a plausible anras now sent to the French ambassadors, setting forth the ty the state of Florence was under of complying with ng's demands, without violating her most sacred engage-, which obliged them to defend the kingdom of Naples t any person that should invade it. This answer being ted to Charles, he ordered the Florentine ambassadors sately to quit his dominions; but, to shew that his reent was chiefly levelled against Peter, he gave leave for eir merchants to remain in his dominions, excepting who were factors or agents for him.

E invasion of Italy by Charles is one of the most shining Charles in modern history. But we shall confine our narrative invades share which the Florentines had in it. Neither they Italy. e pope had yet openly broken with Sforza; and they

o cautious, that they even refused to admit Alphonso's into the harbour of Leghorn. After this, Alphonso and pe, on the 13th of July, had an interview at Vico Varo, ch the operations of the war were fettled, in case that r should execute his threats of invading Italy. Alphonso time had a noble fleet, with which he endeavoured to an impression upon Genoa; but the design was deseated vigilance of the French in that city. The duke of ia, Alphanfo's fon, a young prince of great hopes, ed at the head of an army into the Romagna, where rentine interest was very strong. Astorre Manfredi, the of Faenza, was directed by them; but Caterina Sforza, t of Ottaviano Riverio, lord of Imola and Forli, refused sse her son's territories, unless the Florentines would denemselves, and indemnify him for all he might suffer in This difficulty put a stop to all the operations that en concerted; and it now appeared, that there was in rentine senate a party against breaking with the French, Peter durst not venture of himself to encounter. To : his apprehensions, the duke of Calabria, in an intere had with him at Borgo San Sepulcro, offered him, in ner's name, to employ his army as he (Peter) should. This elated Peter so much, that, returning to Florence, ained, against the sense of his wisest countrymen, leave ne republic, which was to destray all expences, to take ano's towns under the protection of the allies. Giovantivoglio, of Bologna, entered into the service of the allies nuch the same terms.

E success of those negociations might have been at Peter fawith the reduction of the Milanese, had it not been wours the unaccountable slowness of the Neapolitans, or the Ar-court of ragonians, Naping ragonians, as they were called, which gave an opportunity for d'Aubigny, the French general, to march with amazing celerity into the territory of Imola, before the duke's army had quitted Cesena; and thus the operations of the Neapolitans were confined to the Romagna, where the French and Milaness lived in great opulence. All this did not discourage Peter de Medici, who now declared himself openly against the French He admitted the Neapolitan gallies to anchor and victual in the port of Legborn, and to raise recruits all over the Florentine state. He sent one thousand men and some artillery to Ferdinand's army, which, by his order, was now joined by the troops under Bentiveglie and Astorre. We are, however, given to understand that those steps, taken by Peter, were far from being agreeable to the sense of the Florentine senate; nor did their ambassadors at Venice with any vigour second the warm but vain instances made by those of the pope, to induce that republic to join the league; the heads of which, at this time, applied for affiltance even to Bajazet, the emperor of the Turks.

Condust of Storza.

It is probable, that Sforza would now gladly have restrained the vivacity of the French, who were making prodigious preparations for invading Italy; but the allies, instead of encouraging those fentiments in him, and bringing him over to a common league with all the other states of Italy, by their conduct rendered him desperate. His minister at Florence had iltrenuously endeavoured to persuade Peter, by all means, to continue inviolably attached to his league with Alphonfo; and Peter, by Alphonso's advice, disclosed to Charles all that passed between him and Sforza's ambassador on that head. He even went to far as, under pretence of fickness, to give that anbassador audience in his own bed-chamber, where he had concealed the French minister, who overheard all that had posted between him and Sforza's ambassador, who strongly insisted on Peter's entering into engagements for opposing the French invalion, and for continuing in his league with Alphonso. This stratagem, though natural, had a different effect from what Peter expected. When it became public in the French camp. Sforza had address enough to persuade the king, that all is meant was for his fervice; and having now nothing to here farther, from his intrigues, he applied himself in good earned to forward the French expedition. Charles wanted no spur for that. He was then advanced so far as Vienne in Dauphings but destitute of every thing, but invincible obstinacy, for To raise money, he was proceeding on the expedition. obliged to pawn all the jewels of his crown and person. His fubjects, in general, were averse to his proceeding farther; and even his generals, having such proofs of Sforza's irresolution or treachery, were very backward in their obedience. But the inviolable attachment of the French for their monarch overcame all difficulties. The king, obstinate and determined as he was, seemed to be startled, and to waver, at hearing of the disaffection of his troops to the service, and on being disappointed of a fum of money he had expected from Sforza. But the cardinal of S. Piero in Vincola, the determined enemy of the pope and the Florentines, having refettled his resolution. he advanced to Asi, where he received news that the Neapolitans had been beaten by the duke of Orleans from Rapalle, and that Genoa was thereby secured in the French interest. In the French army, fix thousand Swis, then reckoned the best troops on the continent of Europe, served; and Charles, who, by falling ill of the small-pox, was detained a whole month, at last received from Marseilles a large supply of artillery, of a much more commodious construction, and far greater execution, than any which had been till then known in Europe. Charles having now entered Italy, affairs in the Romagna took an unfavourable turn for the pope and the Florentines, where many princes and states fell off from his and the Florentine interest. And though the duke of Calabria at first obtained many advantages over the French and Milanefe, he was at last, through the treachery of those about his person, obliged to retreat, and to act on the defensive. Charles by this time was wanced to Pavia, where he found his coufin-german Gabazzo, the true duke of Milan, on his death-bed, occasioned thro' poison administered by his uncle Sforza. But neither his languishing condition, nor the tears of his beautiful wife and infant son, who threw themselves at his feet for his protection rainst Sforza, could dissuade Charles from proceeding; and the duke dying some days after, Sforza was invested with the Inligns of the duke of Milan, in prejudice of his grand nephew. who was only five years of age. Charles was then at Piaconza; and neither he nor his court, abandoned as it was, could reflect without horror on the villainy and practices of

It is probable, that this horror, and Sforza's trifling with He applies his engagements, were so strong, that Charles, not being joined to the Flosis he expected by the Italians, would have repassed the Alps, rentines, had it not been for the encouragement he met with from the encouragement he met with from the encouragement, Lorenzo and John de Medici, whom we have already mentioned, having broken out of their confinement, repaired to Charles at Piacenza, where they repaired the unpopularity of Peter, and the affection the Florentines had for the French, in such colours as determined Charles.

Charles, at all events, to proceed. Charles, however, was for folicitous of gaining over the Florentines, that he fent them fresh ambassadors, offering them great advantages, if they would fuffer him to proceed; and threatening them with the severest vengeance, if they obstructed his march.

wbo fa-

This message had vast effects upon the minds of the Flarentine people, who now faw themselves exposed to the wrath of a great king, merely through the imprudence of Peter de Medici. It was plain that Charles, had it not been for his resentment against Peter, might have marched to Naples without touching the Florentine territories; but he was determined to subject Tuscany before he proceeded, and he marched by the way of Parma, at the instances of Sforza, to whom he was now reconciled, and who wanted to become matter of Pisa. His army being strengthened by the junction of the Swifs from Genea, he advanced victoriously, and took several places that belonged to the Florentines in the Lunigiana. The Florentines, or rather Peter de Medici, resolved to make their stand against him at Serazana and Serazanella, in a country where his army would find it difficult to procure subsistence if those places held out.

Peter Sub-

But the French carried on war in a manner that for many mits to bim, years had not been known in Italy. Each of their slightest skirmishes were attended with more bloodshed than had been for a century past lost in the greatest battles fought there. Their artillery was irrefistible, and they put a garrison which opposed them to the sword. All those considerations dismayed Peter de Medici, who finding so strong a dislike to him in Florence, came to a resolution unworthy of his rank and family, which was that of throwing himself at the feet of the French king. All that can be alledged in favour of Pater for this daffardly resolution, was the inability of the courts of Rome and Naples to support him, joined to the fresh velentments of his fellow-citizens against him, occasioned by a new order issued by the French for all the Florentine metchants, without distinction, to evacuate their dominions. While Peter was preparing for his journey, a detachment of Florentine horse and soot, under Paul Orsini, marching to reinforce the garrison of Serazana, was cut in pieces by the French. Being admitted, with some difficulty, to the presence of Charles, whose army lay before Serazanella, and in the utmost distress, he agreed, in the most abject manner, to more than was required of him. He immediately gave up Serazana, Serazanella, Pietra Santa, and the citadels of Pifa and Leghorn to the French; that king engaging, by an instrument, to restore them as soon as he should be seared on and betrays bis country; the throne of Naples; and that the Florentines should pay for the French protection and friendship two hundred thousand Borine (A).

PETER's concessions secured all Tuscany to the king, and is and paved his way into the Romagna, where the duke of Ca- himfelf labria was entrenched within the strong lines of a camp near ruined. Faenza, which were, with a great deal of bloodshed, forced by the French. The Florentines now submitted to Charles; and the duke, not knowing whom to trust to, was obliged to retire with precipitation under the walls of Cesena, and from thence towards Rome; so that the Neapolitan affairs began now to wear a very gloomy aspect. It was plain, that the unexpected progress of the French in Italy, was owing to the pufillanimity of Peter de Medici; and the magistrates of Florence sent some of his most determined enemies as their ambassadors to the king. Upon this Peter, under pretence of executing his late engagements with Charles, repaired to Plarence, where his best friends looked coldly upon him; and he was not only denied admittance into the palace of the republic, but proclaimed a rebel, together with his two brothers; and they all three fled to Bologna, where they were received by Bentivoglia with the most bitter reproaches upon Peter's misconduct and cowardice.

Upon this revolution of the Florentine state, the Pifans Revolt of applied to the king, befeeching him to deliver them from the the Pifans. oppressive yoke of the Florentines, which, contrary to his agreement, he promised to do. Upon this the people pulled down the Florentine standards; and the king, sensible of his miltake, ordered the Florentine magistrates to continue in their places; but took possession of the new citadel, leaving the old one, which was of small importance to the Pisans, to the great disappointment of Sforza, who was in hopes of being put into possession of Pisa.

CHARLES was then at Pisa; and sending for d'Aubigny Charles to join him, he proceeded towards Florence, which he en-enters Flotered in the midst of his guards and army as a conqueror, rence as a with his beaver up, and his lance erect. This terrible array, conqueror. depressed and divided as the Florentines were, did not dispirit them. Charles had again and again declared, that he ex-

(A) Sforza arrived in the posed, he had taken a wrong french camp next day, and Pe- road, "One of us, replied told him that he had wanted "Sforza with a sneer, I believe to meet him, but that he had "has." missed him, because, he sup-other hand, infifted upon the double right which the Flarentines had to Pisa, by compact and conquest and that Pila owed her existence to Florence; and concluded by putting the king in mind of the oath and engagements he was under.

Charles faccours

CHARLES favoured the Pisans, but proposed several expedients to keep the Florentines quiet; all which were rethe Pifans, jected. He was, however, obliged to temporize, because he wanted money; and he fent the cardinal of St. Malo to Florence, under pretext of reinstating them in the possession of Pifa; but with secret orders to amuse them till he got the money, which was not yet due. The Florentines, however, generously made their next payment of forty thousand ducats; and the cardinal went to Pila, where, instead of putting the Florentines into possession, he augmented the French garrison, and pretended he could do the Florentines no service, because, not being a soldier, but an ecclesiastic, he could not conquer the obstinacy of the Pisans. In the mean while the latter daily encreased, both in thrength and courage. Sforza, making use of the agency of the Genocle, still at war with the Florentines, sent them a strong reinforcement, both of horse and foot, under Lucio Malvezzo, one of his best generals, and privately encouraged the Siennese to keep possession of ; Monte Pulciano, which had lately revolted to them from the Florentines.

The government of Florence fetlica.

THE latter, as if the perplexity of their affairs called for a continuance of their divisions, were at this time split into a thousand factions about resettling, or rather remoulding, their form of government. They seemed to look back with surprize and horror at their fituation under the family of the Medici; nor did they confider all the advantages it had, brought to their country, as an equivalent for the interruption which they had given to the power of the people. They had preferred the forms of the constitution, but had deprived. them of the substance; and no sooner had Charles lest Fla-, rence, than a meeting of the whole body of the citizens, called a parliament, was held in the Great Square before the palace; and there, according to our author, they formed a model, seemingly popular, but really calculated for the interest of a few. The Florentines quickly perceived the defects of this model; and another meeting was held foon after to alter it, At this affembly, Paolo Antonio Soderini made a long speech, recommending a popular form of government, in which be made a distinction between the ordinary and extraordinary Debates power of the magistrates. He proposed, that all the magistrates and inferior officers, both in the city and territory, should be chosen in an assembly of all who were legally qualified to partake of the government; and that no new laws should be enacted but by fuch an affembly. This method, he thought. would be an incentive for citizens to aspire to public offices by virtue, merit, and modesty. As to the extraordinary powers, those which related to peace or war, the amendments of laws, and other matters of the highest importance in the government, he proposed that the people should chuse a separate magistracy for that purpose, who were to meet and deliberate independently upon them, on all matters committed to their determination, because they require to be treated with superior sagacity, learning, and secrecy. He thought, that on those two points depended the true form of popular gopernment, which might be leifurely polished and improved by his fellow-citizens till it arrived at perfection; and he faid, twas owing to the partition of policy which he proposed, that he state of Venice had so long maintained its liberty and insependency. He advised the members present to lay hold of be present opportunity, now that they were their own maters, to introduce this popular model.

b Nel Parlamento, Guiccia adining ^a See Pages 199, 207. book ii.

SODERINI was answered by Guido Antonio Vespucci, on that citizen likewise of great eminence, who treated Soderini's bead, roposal as chimerical and impracticable, and of all people the world the least fitted to the genius of the Florentines. le thought that Florence, under a popular government, might In from one extreme to another; and being freed from tymy, might plunge into licentiousness, which, he said, was worst tyranny of the two. He thought there was a specical difference between the constitutions of Florence and Veca, because the latter had always a doge at the head of its He appealed to the experience of history, hether their own country, as well as Athens and Rome, id not been always faved by the wisdom of a sew from the Igovernment of the many. But why, faid he, should you ged to the method that has been fettled by the parliament, wich leaves every thing to the disposal of the magistrates, To are not created for life, nor elected by a few, but are Ofen by ballot from amongst those qualified, according to suncient custom of Florence.

It is possible our author himself composed the speeches he History of to into the mouths of those two citizens, the better to il- Savanaro-trate the political topics then agitated amongst his coun-la-trate. But the madness of a Dominican sriar set at nought ing, according to the gloomy ideas of enthuliafts, the invalion of Italy by foreign armies, which no w troops could oppose; and that the Florentine governr. upon the eve of a change, when Italy was in full tra and the house of Medici in power; he was considere people as a prophet; for he disclaimed all carnal and human forefight, and pretended that his infe came from God himself. In short, he brought t great authority to prove, that a new parliament oug fummoned, in order to abolish the present form of ment, and to institute one entirely popular. His as were irrefistible, and his party to numerous, that it last determined that a supreme council should be se the whole body of the citizens, who, according to cient laws, were qualified to bear posts in the gove The business of this council was to chuse all the ma in the city and the state, to settle the public subsidies flrengthen, amend, or alter, the laws in being. The cil being settled, a public decree passed, in the natu Athenian amnesty, for abolishing all heart burning state, and preventing future discords, by enacting, past transgressions and treasons should be forgot.

The gowernment new modelied.

Thus, from the ravings of a mad enthuliast, the tions of a noble constitution were laid, by placing to lative power in the hands of citizens legally qualified in the government, who were to dispose of the epower as they saw proper. This new model admitte who opposed Savanarola so effectually, that in a short time Strange the populace was divided between them, and the parties fel-enthuialim dom met without blows. At last a Dominican was found hardy enough to propose an ordeal, for proving the sanctity of Savanarola; and he offered to walk through a kindled pile of wood; and a Franciscan, to prove the fancitity of his order, effered to do the same. The challenge was accepted of on both fides, and the piles were lighted; but when the two champions were to enter upon the fiery trial, both their hearts The Dominican infifted upon having the hoft in his hand, which was obstinately opposed by the Franciscan, being no part of the agreement; and, neither yielding, both escaped. The Franciscans, however, greatly triumphed ever the Dominicans; and Savanarola's party perceiving his sublity not to come up to the ideas they had conceived of it. mandoned him to the fury of his enemics. The magistrates, of compassion, desired him to make his escape; but the knew how very powerful and inveterate his enemies were, refused to leave the city. Upon this he was apprehended, seven times put to the torture. Little credit is to be ben to confessions taken from a rack; but it is said, that acknowledged himself to be a false prophet, and that he abused auricular confessions, both those that were taken chimself, and those that had been communicated to him by brethren. He was at last condemned, with two of his and death Mernity, to the flames, into which their bodies were thrown, of Savanathey had been strangled.

CHARLES VIII. of France may be faid not to have Charlen hen so much pains in conquering as he did in losing Naples. forced to succeeded by the panic, which his new method of making leave Nas, and the French impetuolity, had spread over Italy. He pless tit by a feries of miscarriages, which none but a weakined prince, furrounded by worthless sycophants, could We been guilty of. Having contracted an infinite contempt the Italians, he suffered his soldiers to run into all kinds excesses, and to practice every indecency that could would Pdelicacy of his new fubjects, who, in a few weeks, thought Airragonian severity far preferable to the French infolence. to this, that Charles, far from acknowledging the zeal the Neapolitans and Italians who had fided with him, gave wall places of posts and power to his French favoration. was equally unattentive to all the other affair, of govern-18: His scandalous breach of faith with the Plarentines; telling their castles; his keeping possession of Pola; and wishing with Sforza, and many other circumstances, made all Italy; so that the neighbouring powers were alarmed. Sforza became as active an instrument. him, as he had been before zealous for him. Finding felf disappointed in all his favourite views, particular of re-annexing Pisa to the dutchy of Milan, he sounce Venetians, whom he found disposed to his wish; and t peror Maximilian, who had particular grounds of quari by a league, Charles, came into their party. Before he left Fra had given up to Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, the fin try of Roufillon, on their engaging not to molest him conquest of Naples; but they soon found evasions for ing those engagements, by pretending that they ha formed under a falvo to any other person's right, and th discovered that the kingdom of Naples was a fief of t man church: they likewise, therefore, came into the federacy. As to the pope, he greedily embraced it.

Europe believe that he intended to economic and to hold

A 3 3

→4 №

which the Florentines re-

THE allies, however, thought their confederacy imp till they could bring the Florentines into it. The st applications were made for that purpole; and Sforza off fuse to join. employ all the power of the league in protecting them the recentment of Charles, and in affifting them to Pisa and Leghorn. This offer, joined to the king's sca infidelity towards them, would, at another time, have the Florentines. But they had experienced, that they have as little dependence upon the Venetians, Sforz the pope, as they could have upon Charles, and therefo determined themselves for a neutrality. There was th merit in this, as they had engaged the cardinal of St by a large fum, to befriend them with Charles, and deceived them. When they complained to Charles I and requested him to oblige the Siennese to restore t Monte Pulciano, he treated them only with taunts and but still they thought that their interest was fafer wi than with Sforza, who, if he came into possession c would retain it for ever; whereas Charles would b obliged to abandon it.

Librafatta ecken.

: ..

CHARLES, notwithstanding his natural indolen alarmed when he heard of the strength of the league against him. He ordered the garrison he had left at A der the duke of Orleans, to be reinforced out of Franc above all, he fent a new body of fix hundred French to force his garrison at Pisa. Librafatta was at that til fieged by Malvezzo, who was in the pay of the Pilan he had been obliged to raise the siege; but being joined new garrison, he renewed it, and took both town and which the Flarentines could not relieve, because of the flowings of the Secchia; and after this, the garrison treated the Fiorentine territory as a conquered country. The Florentines complained bitterly to Charles of those abuses; and he had at last the complaisance to assure them, that if they would have a little patience, he would give them full redress, as he was now upon his return to France.

Bur by this time the league had acquired a formidable Return of degree of strength. The French army, in the kingdom of Charles Naples, had been greatly reduced, and Charles was under a towards necessity of leaving half of it behind him to preserve his con-France. quests. Upon repeated advices of his danger, he resolved to run all lifks, and to force his way to Afi, in his return to France. He first, however, endeavoured to obtain the investiture of the kingdom of Naples from the pope, to whom he offered great terms if he would comply; which his holiness declined to do, and sent for a party of the Venetian and Milanese army to defend Rome, in case Charles should attempt to enter it. Storza and the Venetians at first ordered three thousand men to his affistance; but, on farther reflection, they countermanded their march; so that they, having garrisoned the castle of St. Angelo, left Rome, which Charles entered. and afterwards marched peaceably through all the ecclefiaftical state, except at Toscanella, which refusing entrance to his troops, was stormed and plundered. Charles then arrived at Sienna, where, notwithstanding the urgent motives he had to continue his march, he remained for fix days, and gave audience to the Florentine deputies, who applied to him for the restitution of their castles, according to his solemn promise. To prevail upon him to perform it, they offered not only to pay the thirty thousand ducats that were still due to him, but to escort him to Asti with three hundred men at arms, and two hundred foot, under their general Francisco Charles, confidering his fituation, would not have hesitated a moment in accepting those offers, had he been rightly advised; but Ligni, his kinsman, a young man, but a chief favourite, having a private pique against the Florentines, represented them as an inconfiderable power, and that the French army was able to force its way through all Italy without their affistance. He was joined by de Pienes, who expected from Charles the government of Pisa and Leghern; but the wifer part of his council advised him to relinquish all to the Florentines but Pietra Santa and Serazana, by yielding up which to the Genoese, he might engage them in his interest. Thus the application of the Florentines miscarried; and it is probable that Ligni had a farther view in the advice he gave to his master on that head. Before Charles lest Sienna, a party of A a 4

the Siennese themselves, distatisfied with the government of the nine magistrates they were under, applied to be taken under the protection of Charles, and to have a French gamison, commanded by Ligni. The all the rest of Charle's counsellors disfuaded him from accepting this offer, yet Lieu's counsel prevailed, and Charles received Sienna, and all is territory, under his protection, excepting Monte Pukiano; the difference about which he left to be adjusted between the Siennese and the Florentines. Charles leaving to the Siennese the choice of their governor, they pitched upon Ligni, and affigned him an appointment of twenty thousand crowns, on his engaging to maintain an officer and three hundred foot for their defence. It foon appeared that this weak young man thought of no less than making himself sovereign of Siemen, and perhaps of other parts of Tuscan; but very foon after Charles had left Sienna, the council of nine recovered their authority, and beat the French garrison out of their city.

increases.

THE ambassadors of Maximilian had now given to Sforza frength of the folemn investiture of the duchy of Milan; and he and the the league Venetians prevailed with Bentivoglio to bring the Bolognese into the league. Sforza, understanding that the Germans were the only people they could hire to be depended on to oppose the French, sent to inlist two thousand German foot, and ordered Galeazzo di San Severino to besiege Asti, with the rest of the Germans in his service. Sforza's avarice disappointed his defign. The Germans refused to inlist, because he did not come up to their price. Those under Galeazzo descreed, while the duke of Orleans was so well reinforced from France, that he not only defended Afti, but made himself master of the important city of Novara, and laid fiege to its citadel; and Sforza, who was hated by the Milanefe, must have been ruined, had he not been supported by the Venetians.

Resolution

PETER de Medici, as we have already observed, was of the Flc-at Venice when he received Charles's letter, offering him his rentines. friendship, and to restore him to his power. He communicated this offer to the Venetians, who not only strenuously disfuaded him from agreeing to it, but secretly planted guards over him to observe his motions, and to prevent his escape. He found means, however, to repair to Charles at Sienza. The Florentines expected the latter would pay them a vifit, and that he would bring along with him Peter de Medici. Being constant to their former purpose, they immediately filled their city with troops, and put the people under arms to oppose any attempt in his favour; and this shew of resolution determined Charles to leave Florence on his right hand, and to march to Pi/s.

Pila. During the short time he remained there, news came of the prodigious increase of the force of the confederacy, which was now affembled near Parma; and the reflicution of the Florentine castles was again debated before Charles, and opposed by the same party that had defeated it before. They added to their former arguments, that the strength of the league ought to be a powerful inducement for Charles to keep possession of Pisa, that he might have a sea port to which he might retire, if he should meet with any misfortune in Lombardy; that the Florentines, who were as treacherous as the other Italians, were by no means to be trusted with it; and that his keeping possession of Leghern was necessary, for the security of his kingdom of Naples. Charles at first ap-Charles peared to be undetermined, when the Pifans of all ages, fexes, keeps pofand conditions, threw themselves in floods of tears at his feet, sission of befeeching him, in the most moving manner, not to abandon Pisa. them to their former tyrants the Florentines, from whom they had nothing now to expect but the extremes of cruelty. Their distress moved even Charles's Swifs guards, and one of their captains, Salazart, in the name of the sest, conjured the king to confult his own honour, and that of his crown, by protecting the Pisans against their enemies; and if he stood in need of the Florentine money, that they were ready to lay their collars, plate, money, pensions, and pay, at bis feet. Charles still appearing irresolute, a kind of a tumult ensued. The cardinal of St. Malo, and all about Charles's person, who were thought to be in the Florentine interest, were threatened with death; and Charles still, to keep up some appearances of justice, defired the Florentine ambassa. dors, who remained at Lucca, to meet him at Afti, where he promised to give them fatisfaction. He then lest Pisa, after changing the governor of the citadel, and strengthening the garrisons of the other castles.

It was now perceived that Charles could not proceed to The Asti without a battle. The consederates were strong in the French Parmesan; but three-sourths of their army consisted of Vene-gain the tian troops, who were commanded by Francesco Gonzaga, a battle of brave young prince, under whom served several officers of Fornuogreat reputation and experience. Charles proceeded under vo. great disadvantages; and when his van arrived at Fornuovo, the marshal de Gie demanded in his master's name, a passage for himself and his army. Before he had time to receive an answer, a party of the French was descated by the Venetians; but they not following their blow, the French had time to collect together all their force, and the boldness of Charles's attempt struck his enemics with terror. Both armies at last came to an engagement on the banks of the Tare, in which the French were victorious, notwithstanding the great superiority of their enemies in numbers, and proceeded to Alli. He was not equally fuccessful in his operations where he did not command in person. Ferdinand, king of Naples, re-entered into possession of that kingdom, and was vigorously supported both by the natives and the Spaniards. An expedition which Charles had fent both by fea and land against Genoa, miscarried; while the Venetians and Sforza, now dropping all their frugal maxims, engaged in their fervice ten thousand choice German troops. The turn which affairs had taken at Naples in prejudice of Charles, was favourable to the Florentines, because it rendered their money necessary to him. They had reduced some places which had revolted from them in the neighbourhood of Pisa, particularly Pontesaco, which had furrendered upon capitulation. The Florentine foldiers, however, were so exasperated by the cruel treatment they had received, that they broke the capitulation, by putting to death some of the French who had been in the fort, and would have killed more, had not the Florentine commisfaries interposed. Their enemies about Charles made a handle of this for breaking off the treaty; but his necessities determined him at last to fign it with their deputies, which he did while he was at Turin.

A treaty.

THE terms were, that all the towns and forts belonging to the Florentines should be immediately restored; the Florentines obliging themselves, upon a valuable consideration, at the end of two years, to give up Pietra Santa and Serazana to the Genoese, if Charles was then master of that city; that the ambassadors should pay down the thirty thousand ducas, that were in arrears upon the convention at Florence; and that upon the restitution of the castles, for which they had security in jewels, the Florentines should lend to the king, upon the credit of his receivers-general, seven thousand ducats, which they were to distribute amongst his friends in Naples; that if they were not engaged in any war in Tuscany, excepting that concerning Monte Pulciano, they should send to the king's affistance in Naples, the troops that ferved under Vitelli in the Pisan; but if they were free of all war, they were then to send two hundred and fifty men at arms on the same service, but not to stay longer than the month of October; that the Pisans should enjoy a general indemnity; that their effects should be restored to them, and that they should be encouraged in the cultivation of the arts and sciences; and that fix of the principal citizens of Florence, should be delivered to the king as hostages. WHILE

WHILE this treaty was negotiating, another was on foot Another in at Vercelli between Charles and the allies, who granted him favour of every thing with an intention to perform next to nothing. the Pifans. All they meant was to prevail on him to leave Italy, which he accordingly did. Sforza set all the French prisoners at liberty, restored the ships taken at Rapalle, removed his general Fracassa from Pisa, and delivered the castelletto of Genoa to the duke of Ferrara, and performed some other immaterial circumstances of the treaty, but evaded the rest; and such was his artful management, that he prevented the execution of the treaty of Pisa between Charles and the Florentines. All this he did under pretence that tho' he was fovereign of the Genoese, yet he had no compulsive power over their conduct; a distinction he invented after the treaties were signed. Under this evalion, he disappointed the Frenchiking of the succours that had been stipulated to be sent from Genoa, to support his interest in Naples; but, without having recourse to any pretexts, he stopped Antonio Vespucci, one of the Florentine deputies, in his road between Turin and Florence, with the treaty in his pocket, rifled him of his papers, and fent him prisoner to Milan. Perceiving by the treaty that the Florentines, as soon as Pisa was given up, were to send succours in men and money to the French in Naples, he and the Venetians contrived how to defeat the rendition. Each of them had an eye upon Pija; Sforza, for reasons already hinted at, and the Venetians, because they aspired to the sovereignty of Italy, and knew that the Florentines could not preserve Leghorn without Pisa, which was the gate to Tuscany, and would give them the command of all the Mediterranean. Sforza knew their delign, and countermined them. Thus Pisa was fed with hopes from both.

THE Florentines, sensible of the difficulties they had to en- The war counter before the treaty of Turin could be executed, raised is renewed. an army, took the castle of Palaia, and encamped before Vico Pisano almost at the gates of Pisa. Here it appeared, that Entragues, the governor of the citadel of Pifa, and the other French generals, were as backward as the Pilans themfelves were, towards admitting the Florentines into that city. Paul Vitelli, pretending secret orders from Charles, threw himself into Vico Pisano, from the siege of which the Florentines were driven with vast loss and disgrace. Authentic duplicates of the treaty of Turin, however, arriving in Tuscany, Beaumont, the French governor, presently gave up Leghorn to the Florentines; but when he began to confult with En-The Flotragues about the rendition of Pisa and the other places, the rentines latter trifled so egregiously, that the Florentines were obliged defeated.

to complain to Charles who was at Vercelli. He seemed to blame Entragues, and sent him positive orders, which were no better obeyed than the former. He still found means to evade the performance; and the Pilans, who had now one thousand mercenaries in their pay, erected a strong fort at the Florentine gate, for their defence. This fort lay under the cannon of the citadel; and Entragues thinking the Florestines could not take it, invited them to come to the Florentine gate, and take possession of Pisa. Paul Vitelii, whom the Florentines had brought, or rather bought over to their interest, knew that the Pisans were determined to make refistance; and instructed the Florentines so well, that they carried the fort and drove the Pisans within it into the suburb, which they entered and took possession of. But while they thought themselves secure of success, the French governor all of a sudden fired upon their troops so furiously, that they were obliged to abandon the place, and retire to Fakina, from whence they again complained to Charles.

To embarrass the Florentines more, the allies and the pope

Design to bouse of Medici.

favour the now espoused the cause of Peter de Medici, and his kinsman Virginio Orsini, and sought to put him in possession of his family power in Florence. This design was strongly supported. Peter was master of ten thousand ducats in ready money; Virginio was at the head of a body of veterans; Bentivoglio was hired by the Venetians to act in concert with Sforza; and Caterina Sforza was to harrass them from Imola and This plan was formed at Rome, while the Venetions still continued at war with the Siennese about Monte Pulcians, where they beat Giovanni Savelli's regiment, took him prifoner, and demolished a fortress the Siennese had erected on the borders of the Florentine dominions. Peter was likewise encouraged to hope for affiltance from the Perugians, whose sovereign was the pope; but their master was Baylioni, a friend to the Medici family. Peter and Virginio set out for Rome, with fanguine expectations of fuccels from the affiftances promiled them, but chiefly from the divisions that prevailed in-Florence. They continued for some time in the Perugian territory, and performed several important services to Bagliant and the Perugians. They could not, however, bring either of them to declare for them, the Florentines having engages them in their interests by money, and taken some of the Baglioni family into their pay. Peter likewise sailed in a defign he had formed against Cortona, which was discovered by a mean fugitive; and not only that place was reinforced. from the Florentine army, which still lay in the Pisan, but fuch. measures were taken as prevented l'irginio from joining with the Siennese. Peter and Virginio next endeavoured to force the Perugians; and this, together with the bad condition of their troops, who amounted to no more than three hundred men at arms and three thousand foot, made their friends look cold upon them. All they could obtain of Bentiveglio was permission to inlist men in the Bolognese; and Sforza had encouraged Peter only with a view of distracting the Florentimes, while the Venetians refused to act, till they had proofs from Sforza that he was in earnest. But the real view of both was to drive the French out of Naples.

In the mean while, Peter and Virginio were obliged to with- Ferdinand draw to Rapolano in the Siennese; but here Virginio, disgusted gains with the conduct of the confederates, entered into the fer- ground in vice of France, and marched to Naples, where the army of Naples. king Ferdinand every day gained ground. Pifa was still in possession of Entragues, who, notwithstanding the most peremptory orders fent him by Charles, not only refused to deliver up the citadel to the Florentines, but in the beginning of the year 1496, he, by the intervention of Lucio Malvezzo, who was an agent for Sforza, (tho' he pretended to act for the Genoese) agreed to deliver up the citadel to the Pisans, on the payment of twenty thousand ducats. The Pisans firuck the bargain, tho' all their state was not able to raise half the money. But the Genoese lent them four thousand ducats, the Venetians four thousand, and Sforza four thoufand, tho' at that very time he pretended to negociate a perpetual peace with the Florentines. By this means the Pifans were enabled to pay the twenty thousand ducats, twelve thoufand of which Entragues appropriated to himself, and divided the remainder amongst his troops.

THE general opinion now was, that Charles had either Disingenu. secretly authorized Entragues for what he did, or that the ity of the latter would lose his head. Neither was the case. Charles French was fincere, but was weak enough to be bullied, or flattered, governor into an approbation of all that had been done by Entragues, towards who stipulated in the convention, that he still should be so- the Flovereign of Pifa. This was the more extraordinary, as the rentines. surrender of Pisa absolutely disabled the Florentines from performing to Charles the engagements they had entered into by the treaty of Turin, and greatly contributed to his losing the kingdom of Naplés. The Pisans, who razed their citadel as foon as it was in their possession, did not pretend to be independent; but they had a mortal aversion at all dependency upon the Flarentines. They implored the affiftance of all the Italian powers, and would have directly given themselves up to the subjection of Sforza, had he not been askaid of incur-

were by them confidered as a common cause, tho' each secretly

The affairs of Pila

ring the refentment of his other allies.

aspired to be master of that city. As to the Florentines, they were now obnexious to all the rest of Italy, on account of their attachment to the French; and all the consederates engaged to support the Pilans in maintaining their newly recovered liberty, which was confirmed to them even by Maximilian, as lord paramount of Italy. The dispute for the possession of Pisa lay now between the Venetians and Sforza. and was carried on by both parties doing the Pisans all the good offices, and giving them all the affiftance that was in their power, even to a profusion of men and money. Sforza, however, partly through avarice, and partly through a natural craft, which led him fometimes to fpin his politics too fine, began to flacken in his remittances to the Pilans, which made them apply the more assiduously to the Venetians, who supplied them so generously, that the Pisans offered to put themselves under their protection. The matter was debated in the fenate of Venice, where the wifest members were against accepting the offer, and were for maintaining the independency of the Pisans; but they were over-ruled by the party of their doge Agostino Barbarico. A public decree was drawn up by the senate, for taking the Pisans under the protection of Venice, for the defence of their liberty. cellent author I last quoted b, has exhibited a true, but very Circulter extraordinary character of Sforza. With great wit and abiof Siorza, lities he had a fund of vanities and weaknesses. He was the herald of his own praise, and used to boast that he was the fon of fortune, and could manage his mother as he pleafed. He publicly ascribed to his own merit all the great events that had happened in Italy for ten years before; and he vaunted in being the author of the most infamous connsels. provided they were successful. This arrogance became so habitual, that he imagined himself to possess a kind of a political infallibility; and he affected the character of cunning and treachery so greatly, that he was pleased with the appellation of the Moor.

The Florentines
towned
b, Charles

ALL that the Florentines could do under the general odium of all the states of Italy, was to make earnest, but fruitless applications to Charles. That prince continued to favour them, and sent the most peremptory orders to all his officers and governors, who were in possession of the other places and casses stipulated by the treaty of Turin to be delivered to the Florentines, immediately to surrender them. He even

b Guicciardini, book iii.

ed the Flarentine commissaries to repair to the castle of zana, and take possession of it; but instead of that, the th deputy-governor fold it before their faces to the Gefor twenty-five thousand ducats. The governor of Seralla followed his example; and Sforza sent Fracassa, his ral, with one hundred horse and four hundred foot into Lunigiana, to over-awe the Florentines in those parts. after Entragues gave up Librafatta to the Pifans, and Pietra Santa and Mutrone to the Lucquese for twenty-six sand ducats. Those infulis upon Charles, when at the ht of his refentment, produced only a verbal order that raques should not return to France; and his patron Ligni cenfured, only by being deprived of the honour of fleepall night in the king's bed-chamber. The insolent faite however, and his dependent, were soon after restored ie full enjoyment of their master's favour. The Florenwere obliged to put up with all, because, while the conrates were in possession of Pija, it could not be their into break with France; and indeed, at this very time, the entines had refisted both their importunities and menaces, inter into their alliance, upon which the confederates, providing for the safety of Pija, applied themselves in-I to the Neapoiltan war. The Venetians, at the same , gained over Afterre, the lord of Faenza, to be a check the Florentines.

HE Florentines, on the other hand, having no dependence who trein the French, most earnefilly requested Charles to return tares to reerson into Italy; and that prince made great preparations turn to he expedition, which was to be carried on by sea and Italy.

Charles was the more animated to this, as the cike of y and the marquis of Mantiferrat feemed to be disposed to him; and he was not even without hopes that the terror is arms would induce Sorza to break with the allies. For purpole, he dispatched Righali, one of the onies officers is houshold, to let Jonza know his danger; but to offer his friendship, upon his performing the articles of the y of Verceill, and renewing his alliance with France. za was stanted at the new of the preparations making Marles, which far exceeded these for his last expedition; he amused Rigarit with the block present, the, finding self imposed on, he less Miller Sperga witted Maximito march into Italy, and brought the Venciaes to confent and an army and money to Miller is to oppose the French to objected, however, to the many of Miller is to be a to object to the many of Miller is to the many of t pretentions upon firms of the core forces, and to making za the general of the collision; but so lait, is i be أنماتننا should throw himself into the arms of France, they agreed to all he proposed.

The allies attack the Florentines,

WE are now to consider the interests of France and Fl. rence as the same. The allies employed Bentivoglio to attack the Firentines on the fide of Bologna, while the Siennese and the Pifans were to do the fame in other quarters: but the' Bentivoglio was in the pay of the confederates, he was terrified by the greatness of the French power, and gave Charles private assurances that he would not execute his commission. It was with some reason thought, that, if Charles had prosecuted this undertaking with the same vigour he began it, he might have reduced all Italy to his obedience. But the cardinal of St. Mals, his treasurer and first minister for Italian asfairs, had been corrupted by the pope and Sforza, to retard the operations; which he found plaufible pretexts to do, notwith flanding all the impetuolity of Charles, who loitered away his time in a love-intrigue, though all his friends in Italy, even with tears, implored him to be expeditious, the French being now reduced to the last extremity in the kingdom of Naples; where Ferdinand died, in the height of all his glory, and was succeeded by his uncle Federigo, or Frederick, a prudent prince. Pleasure rendered Charles deaf to all solicitations to fet out on his march, though Maximilian, in consequence of a convention between him and the allies, had already entered Italy, and undertook to compromise all differences relating to Pifa. The Florentines, notwithstanding the indolence of Charles, and all the applications of the allies, continued firm in their attachments to France, in which the government was greatly confirmed by the fermons and harangus of Savanarola, who thundered out judgments against the court of Rome and the allies. This enthuliast had even interest enough to prevail upon the Florentines fingly to stand the shock of the contederacy, though the French king could give them no affistance; and, had he been willing, his abilities were, very questionable, because his generals and ministers paid ma regard to his orders. It is certain, that, humanly speakings the prospect of the Florentines was at this time very uncome fortable. They still maintained, though at a great expense to themselves, a war with the Pifans, who continued to supported by the Venetians; but its operations were indecilied and to trifling, that they deferve no particular mention the Their generals, Francesco Secco and Ercole Beniton lis, however, obtained some advantages, which cost the formets Their war with the Siennese, who were likewill, fupported by the allies, was equally unimportant; though that great patriot ! cter Capponi was killed in storming a little place, not to be found upon the maps. By those wars, the of Florence became good foldiers, and the Venetians I vigorously to support them; while Sforza, who as in earnest in any thing he undertook, cooled more in his friendship, and at last seemed intirely to aban-. This was owing to his dependence on the great of the emperor Maximilian, who now fent two amto the Florentines, to notify his intention to make up nces amongst the Italian princes and states, and renem to suspend their hostilities against the Pisans. entines returned a polite but vague answer to this inand the Venetians, equally suspecting Maximilian a, ordered to Pisa greater supplies, both of men and han they ever had fent before. This confideration rza once more into a correspondence with the Floand he endeavoured by all means to persuade them This they peremptorily They refuse to Maximilian's decision. do, unless they were previously put into possession of to Submit d, having put Leghorn into a state of defence, they to Maxiled their forces in the Pifan. The truth is, Maxi-milian's otwithstanding his high sounding titles, made so arbitragure in Italy, and was himself in such needy cires, that the Florentines despised him, and believed only the tool of Sforza. They affected, however, profound regard for his imperial authority; but gave. nderstand, that they expected he would put them ssion of Pifa, before they came to any resolution the confederacy. Maximilian was so much nettled declaration, which he received at Genoa, that he Flarentine deputies no other answer than referring ne pope's legate, who referred them to Sforza; who "ilan; to which city the deputies repaired, and there quifite scene of diffigulation passed: for while the vere waiting for an audience from Sforza, they relers from Florence, where the result of their negociainown, to return home, without entering upon bufihim. They were introduced, however, into his under pretence of paying him their compliments; is art, though he declared the emperor had inm with his answer, could not draw them into any in on that or any other head; which threw Sforza, d not bear the thoughts of being outwitted, into a fion; fo that he abruguly broke up the conference, he had invited all his chief nobility and foreign mitat they might be withelfes of his triumph in overthe Florentines.

la cre

MAXI

HIST, VCL. XXXVI.

wbo repairs to Pisa.

MAXIMILIAN now in good earnest proceeded against the Florentines; and a Genoese squadron landed him at Ports Spezie, from whence he went to Pifa, and made dispositions for befieging Leghorn both by sea and land. The Florentines, on their part, hired a body of French troops; and a French fleet, designed for the relief of Naples, threw the troops into Leghorn, together with a large quantity of provisions, which the belieged flood in great need of. This relief was so seasonable, that the Plorentines attributed it to the immediate interposition of Providence in their favour, which Savanarola had predicted some days before. The siege, however, went on; and the French squadron proceeding on its voyage, Maximilian straitened the place both by sea and land. But the place was well provided for refistance; and a storm arose, which wrecking the Venetian and Genoele fleets, disheartened him so, that he precipitately raised the slege; and, to the amazement of all Italy, he marched to the Milanele, after doing the Florentines no farther damage than plundering at almost nameless village. From the Milanese, without acquainting any one of his intention, he returned to Germany, and left the Italians full of contempt for his publicanimity, folly, and poverty.

The Venetians support the Pilans.

MAXIMILIAN, and the few German troops he had with him, which did not amount to above two thousand, being withdrawn from Tuscany, Sforza recalled his army likewise, and lest the whole weight of the war upon the Venetians, who supported it at a prodigious expence. In the mean while, the French intirely lost Naples; and Charles fought to take his revenge upon the Genoeles who were out of humour with the duke of Milan, for not giving them the preference to the Lucquese in the sale of Pietra Santa. Sforza, upon this; took into his pay some troops that Maximilian had left in Italy, and fent them to Genoa; and, forgetting all his disgusts at the Venetians, he offered them his friendship. Charles, by this time, had fent a strong body of Swiss and French, under Trivulzi, to Afti, and prepared to attack the Milanese as well as Genoa. With this view, he required the Florentines to fiyour him, by attacking the Lunigiana and the Eastern Riviers Sforza, who had yet received no succours from Venice, we not prepared to stand those shocks, and the campaign of 1497 opened with great advantages on the fide of the French; and had Trivulzi been properly authorized, he could have take Alessandria, and have marched to the gates of Milan. Bi fearing to proceed without orders, Sforza not only receive the Venetian reinforcements, but took such measures again Genza as defeated all the attempts of the French there. The penerals laid the blame upon the Florentines; but the miscarfiage was owing to the dilatory wavering counfels of Charles; for the Plorentines refused to take the field at the time required, because his army was not at hand to support them. The same backwardness and inconstancy obliged Trivulzi to forego all the advantages he had obtained in the Milanese, and to retire to Affi. Many reasons were assigned, besides the backwardness of the Florentines. The most probable were, that an Italian war was disagreeable to the French in general; that Sforza's money had great influence in the counsels of Charles; and that the duke of Orleans, who was next heir to the crown of France, and had been appointed to command in Italy, difliked being out of the kingdom, as the state of Gharles's health was now almost desperate.

gent-

THE war between the Florentines and Pisans was still car- The war tied on, and count Rinuccio obtained some advantages over continues. Manfrone the Pisan general. But a long truce being made between the kings of France and Spain, in which the Pisans were included, gave them a breathing time; the Florentines, who were included in it likewife, not daring to continue the war against them, while they were under so powerful a protection. They were however under prodigious apprehensions left the Pisans, who were the only gainers by the truce, should keep possession of Pisa, and Peter de Medici should regain his authority in Florence. They were joined, for his own pur Sforza faposes, by Sforza, who wished rather to see Pisa in the hands wours the of the Florentines than of the Venetians; and he represented, Florenboth to the pope and the Spaniards, who had now a great times. fway in the affairs of Italy, the bad policy of obliging the Flarentines to depend on the French for the recovery of Pila. which was detained from them by the Venetians. him, on the other hand, represented the Florentines as being eturally inclined to the French; and were so far from shewis any disposition to restore Pisa to them, that they insisted Leghorn being delivered up by the Florentines into the ands of the confederates; a demand which startled the pope and Sforza fo much, that they dropt the affair of the restituand confulted how to break off the connections between Referentines and the French, by restoring Peter de Medici to authority in Florence, which was now split into factions. swinarola's enthusiasm in favour of the popular government, d gained him a great party; and many of the public offices e filled with his followers, who were generally men of low illiberal education: Their misconduct, and a scarcity of which happened at that time, was favourable to the views - Peter, who was likewise backed by the Venetians, because B b 2

Peter de

unsuccess-

Medici

ful.

they thought their friendship would be so necessary to him, that he would give Pisa up for ever to their possession. Peters chief dependence, however, lay upon Bernardo del Nera, a friend of his family, and a man of virtue, interest, and ability, and who was chosen gonfalonier; as were several of his other friends into the principal posts of the government. The Attempt of pope came into the scheme of restoring Peter; and Sfersa feemed to be indifferent as to the matter. The cardinal S. Severino, and Alviano, an officer of some distinction, were Peter's friends. The Venetians furnished him with money; and Sienna not being included in the late truce, he obtained from the Siennese one thousand horse and foot; and he set out at their head in the afternoon, in hopes to surprise Florence by day-break. A storm, which arose in the night-time, disconcerted his measures; and it was late in the morning when be arrived before Florence. The Florentine magistrates, by this time, had taken the alarm: they gave Paul Vitelli the command of their troops in the city, they fent for their army in the Pisan, and imprisoned all whom they suspected to be Peter's friends. Thus, after waiting four hours within bow-shot of Florence, he was obliged to return to Sienna; while his friend Alviano plundered Todi, and put to death fifty-three of

Its confequences.

THE attempt of Peter de Medici upon Florence, though disappointed, was attended with bloody effects. It is certain he had many friends there; and the whole of his correspondence being laid open, they were either committed to prison, or obliged to fly. Four citizens of great eminence, Nicole Ridolfi, Gianozzo Pucci, Giovanni Cambi, and Lorenzo Tornebuoni, were capitally convicted, and put to death, for favouring him. Bernardo del Nero, the gonfalonier, was tried, and condemned to die, for being privy to the conspiracy, and not preventing it. This fentence, though legal, was held to be fevere, and his friends appealed to a general affembly of the people. The magistrates, however, pronounced his case not to be appealable, and figned a fentence, which put him to death that very night. This strain of authority was undoubtedly a violation of the principles of popular government, which Savanarola and his faction espoused; but it suited their interest, and all other considerations were forgot.

Truce be-ITULEN France and Spain.

THE crowns of France and Spain had now entered into a truce for two months, without consulting any of the Italian powers, and loudly censured the Venetians for perpetuating discord in Italy, by keeping possession of Pisa. Incredible are the fluctuations which at this time happened in Haly, where the public jealousy of the Venetians disposed almost every

the Gibelin faction.

power in it to favour the French. The Florentines were perpetually foliciting Charles to hasten his expedition, and had made d'Aubigny the general of their army. The marquis of Mantua, who had been ungratefully dismissed by the Venetians, after doing them eminent services, entered likewise into the Florentine pay. The duke of Savoy was naturally attached to the French, and consequently to the Florentines. Bentivoglio of Bologna promised to join the French; and even the pope himself engaged not to oppose them. The unaccountable trifling of Charles destroyed all those sair appearances. He had formed many engagements in Italy, particularly with the Vitelli and the Orsmi; but had sent no money to fulfil them: fo that, in some cases, the Florentines were obliged to make them good, and likewise to lend Charles money. In thort, the French interest in Italy, about the beginning of the year 1498, was incirely destroyed.

THE Florentines, having thus no dependence on France, The Floapplied in great secrecy to the pope, and offered to come into rentines the Italian confederacy, provided they were put into pos-apply to the fession of Pisa, which had been, in fact, all along, the great pope. bait for their attachment to France. The pope greedily embraced the proposal, and pressed the Venetians upon that head, as being the only means of confolidating all the Italian powers against the invasions of the Ultramontanes. The Venetians recriminated; and, without pretending to any property in Pifa, upbraided their confederates for deviating from their promife to maintain the Pifans in their liberty, and for ungratefully rewarding the services that Venice had performed for the public good of Italy, though their situation was such, that they could not have partaken in the common calamity, had tho Ultramontanes been successful. During those altercations, Charles VIII. of France, died fuddenly at Ambois, and was fucceeded by Lewis duke of Orleans, a prince who had been bred a foldier, of a good understanding, far advanced in life, and, in almost every respect, the reverse of Charles. His claim upon the kingdom of Naples was the same with that of Charles; and he had, besides, a private claim, in right of his own blood, upon the dutchy of Milan, as descending, by the The female fide, from the Viscontis, its lawful and original mas- French ters. -As his title, in point of hereditary right, was unquef- king retionable, that of the Sforza family being only by a natural Johnes to daughter, Lewis resolved not to lose fight of it; and had, invade even while he was duke of Orleans, made some attempts to Milan. affert it. Add to this, that he had reasons for entertaining a personal hatred to Sforza; and, on his accession to the crown of France, he assumed the titles of king of the Two Sicilies Bbз (which

(which included Naples) and duke of Milan. He notified in form to the Florentines, and the other Italian states, his determined intention to make good those claims, and to begin with that of Milan. Almost all circumstances concurred in favouring his undertaking. He had all the advantages his predecessor was possessed of, and the Italian powers had an opinion of his steadiness. By a strange refinement in politics, the Florentines were the only people in Italy who dissiked the accession of Lewis to the throne of France, and preferred Sforza's friendship to his. The pope and the Venetians counted him; and Sforza, to divert the storm impending on his own dominions, persuaded the Florentines to make their court to him likewise. But Sforza never lost fight of Pisa, of which he wanted to disposses the Venetians, and now in good earnest affished the Florentines to recover it. The Florentines all this while were continuing the war in the Pisan; but were defeated at S. Regulo, in one of those skirmishes which their historians call a battle. The Florentine general was Rinuccio, who, on the loss of this battle, the particulars of which are not worth recounting, intirely lost his reputation. They gave Paul Vitelli, whom they had a high opinion of, the command of their forces, with the title of captain-general; and made application to the French king to interpole in their favour, but without any effect. They had much better success with Sforza, who grew more and more jealous of the Venetians, and therefore fent a trufty agent to Florence, to concert what was most proper for reinstating them in the possession of Pifa. All Italy was then in peace, but the Florentines and the A few disputes had happened, indeed, in the Romagna; but they were of little consequence, and soon terminated.

Sforza breaks with the SFORZ A became now so unmeasurably realous of the Venetians as to proceed to an open breach with them. He began by denying their troops a passage through the Rarmesan Venetians and Pontremoli to Pifa, which obliged the Venetians to take 2 large compass by the Ferrarese; and he sent a strong reinforcement to the Florentines, with an offer, which was accepted of, to pay his share towards a new levy of three hundred men at arms, part to be commanded by Paul Baglions, and part by the lord of Piombino. He likewise lent them three hundred thousand ducats; and so effectually represented the dangerous consequences, to Italy, of the Venetians keeping possession of Pifa, that the pope promised to affish him and the Florentinus with one hundred men at arms, and three gallies, for intercepting the succours of the Venetians to Pila. The mind of his holiness, however, was so intent upon aggrandizing his cwn family, whom he expected to put into possession of the kingdom of Naples, that he paid little or no regard to his engagements with the Florentines.

NOTWITHSTANDING the backwardness of his holiness. the Florentines, having a great opinion of their general Paul Vitelli, and trufting to the friendship of Sforza, once more took the field against the Pisans, who continued still to be vigorously supported by the Venetians. Sforza brought Bentivezlio intirely into his own interests; and, at this period, we are to consider the interests of the Florentines and Sforza as being the same. Sforza made large additions to his own troops, and lent others to the Florentines, to defend them from all attempts that might be made against them by the Venetians. The lord of Faenza was then the ally of Venice; and, to ballance his interest, the Florentines took into their pay Ottaviane Riccio, the lord of Imola and Forli. This Ottaviane, according to Guicciardin, was intirely directed by his mother Caterina Sforza, who had been privately married to the cardinal Giovanni de Medici, and therefore earnestly defired to see the authority of the Medici samily restored in Florence.

THE recovery of Pifa to the Florentines was now the bone The Pifan of contention in Italy. Sforza, by his authority with the war con-Lucquese, prevailed on them to withdraw great part of their tinues. succours from the Pisans; but the Florentines had the misfortune at this time to be engaged in a war, not only with the Pisans, but with the Geneese, on account of their affairs in the Lunigiana; and both states were the irreconcileable enemies of the Florentines. But the latter, now secure of Sforza, took the field against the Pisans, and obtained many advantages over them and their protectors the Venetians. The Florentine general, Paul Vitelli, might even have laid fiege to Pila; but he declined it, and, croffing the Arno, he invested and stormed Buti, by which he straitened Pisa itself. After this, Vitelli crected a fort on the hill of S. Giovanni della Vena, and made great progress towards besieging Pisa itself; for he even opened trenches before Vico Pisano, which was in a manner a suburb of Pisa, and which was obliged to surrender to him. He afterwards cut in pieces a body of Venetian troops, who came to affift in taking the fort of Pietra Dolorofa, which had been belieged by the Pilans.

THE Venetians now thought that they had proceeded in the A negociative as far as was confishent with their interest, which was tion fet on intirely confined to Pifa. They therefore made some advances foot; towards an accommodation with the Florentines; and the latter yielded up a point, which had been long contested, that purpose.

B b 4

but to no

of giving the Venetian republic the right hand in the negociarion. Guido Antonio Vespucci, and Bernardo Rucellai, two citizens of great authority, were fent to Venice, to negociate on the part of the Florentine republic, which was at this time fincerely disposed for a peace. To give weight to their negociations, they brought a powerful army into the field, and the duke of Milan declared openly in their favour. The ambassadors met with a polite reception at Venice: but infifted upon the right which their republic had to The answer of the Venetians was civil, plausible, Pifa. and dilatory. The Spanish ambassador was called in to mediate; and he proposed, that the possession of Pifa should revert to the Florentines as a confederate, but not a subject, The Venetians exposed the futility of that distinction; and not only continued to reinforce Pifa, but espoused the cause of Peter de Medici. They likewise endeavoured to gain over to their service Bentivoglio of Bologna, who had seized on some cattles belonging to the Milanese; and the Siennese refused to make any peace with Florence, unless the Florentines would absolutely renounce all their right to Monte But Pandolfo, who then had the chief sway in Sienna, being a friend to the Florentines, brought his countrymen to agree to a five years truce with them on such advantageous terms, as established his authority in that state; and the Venetians, under the duke of Urbino, were denied & passage through its territory.

The Venetians attack the Florentines.

THE Venetians, upon this, resolved to attack the Florentines, by the Remagna, in hopes of being able to master the towns at the foot of the Appennines, through the interest of Peter de In this defign they partly succeeded, and would have gained a passage into the vale of Mugelli, had it not been for the resolution of the governor of Castiglione, who held that place out fo long, that count Rinuccio and the lord of Piombino marching to its relief, raised the siege. ruption into the Florentine territories induced the duke of Milan to fend to the Florentines a powerful reinforcement, while Paul Vitelli, in the Pisan, took Vico Pisano and Librofatto, after a fiege of four days. The Venetians, alarmed with this fuccels, practifed on the marquis of Mantua, who had some differences with the duke of Milan, to leave his fervice, which he accordingly did, and the marquis was sent to Pifa with Great things might have been three hundred men at arms, expected from this defection of so powerful a prince, had the Venetians encouraged him. But they were induced by some of the friends of the Medici tamily to believe they could get possession of Bibienna in the Casantin, which would have given given so powerful a diversion to the Florentines, as to secure to the Venetians the possession of Pisa without expense. Thus the marquis, having only a bare title, was lest without any support or following; and, out of resentment, he returned to the service of Sforza, with the title of captain-general of the imperial and Milanese troops.

In the mean while, the Florentines had intelligence of the and diffress design against Bibienna, and sent a commissary to prevent it. them; But though he imprisoned some of the suspected parties within the town, he behaved in all other respects with so little care and precaution, that Bibienna was taken by stratagem, without a blow being struck. Alviano, the friend of Peter de Medici, then besieged Poppi, the strongest fortress in the vale of Bibienna; but was bassed before it through the vigilance of the Florentines. The duke of Urbino, however, penetrated into the Casantin, which he subdued, all but the fortress of Poppi; but the Florentines had the good fortune to discover and suppress a plot formed by the Venetians, for becoming masters of Arezzo.

THE irruption of the Venetians into the Casantin obliged but they are the Florentines to recal their general Paul Vitelli from the worsted. Pisan, after he had in vain endeavoured to take Pisa. He marched directly into the Casantin, where the Venetians were encamped in the neighbourhood of Prato Vecchio, which he obliged them to abandon; and, being joined by Fracassa with one thousand Milanese troops, he drove the Venetians into prodigious difficulties; so that their wisest senators began to be tired of the war. At their persuasion, a fresh negotiation was set on soot at Ferrara, where the principal deliberation was how to get decently rid of Pisa, which had cost such immense sums to the Venetian republic. But a new scene now opened in Italy.

LEWIS XII. king of France, was bent on the conquest Views of of Milan, and for that purpose entered into a strict contede-the Italian racy with the Venetians. The pope, on the other hand, had powers, entirely devoted himself to the acquisition of the kingdom of Noples for his samily, and to a match between Charlotta, the daughter of Federigo king of Naples, who had been brought up at the French court, and his son the cardinal of Valenza, afterwards the samous Cæsar Borgia, who, on that occasion, renounced the ecclesiastical life and habit. The French king and the pope mutually assisted each other. The king wanted to be divorced from his wise, and the pope to acquire one into his samily. The sentence of divorce between the king and the queen was presented to the former by Cæsar Borgia, who, as a reward, was made duke of Valenting

ρλ

besides the possession of the city of Valence. Lewis then applied himself seriously to the conquest of the Milanese; and, for that purpose, made a peace with the emperor Maximilian, and the kings of England and France. Sforze was no franger to his intention, and endeavoured all he could to couptermine him, by gaining the Florentines and the Venetique to his interest. That he might induce the Florentines to befriend him, he pressed the Venetians to deposit Pisa in his hands, and promised to deliver it to the Florentines in a certain time. Other historians say, that the Florentines agreed to deposit Pisa in the hands of Lewis, or of Paul Vitelli, or the college of the cardinals. Be that as it will, it is certain that the Florentines were divided on this occasion. They had hitherto no reason for trusting the French king, and a great party in their state wanted to see the duke of Milos humbled. The Venetians strengously opposed all the motions towards a deposit. The duke of Milan likewise countermined it, left it should be the means of uniting the Venetians and the Florentines. It was the interest of France to keep the Italian powers divided; and the pope, who had a great sway in the negotiation, took part with France in the case of the deposit, which he thought would add to the dignity and of the and importance of the holy see. To conquer the stubborn-French. ness of the Venetians, in the affair of the deposit, they were offered Cremona and the whole Ghiradadda; but this offer could not be accepted of, without aggrandizing the French too much in Italy. The affair was debated in the senate of Venice, where it was resolved, at all events, to declare against Sforza, and to join with France; but without concluding any thing with regard to the deposit of Pila. Lewis, whose great aim was to take possession of Milan, did not relish this conduct; because it tended to cement the interests of Sforza with those of the Florentines. He, therefore, negotiated a peace with Maximilian, who had many claims upon the Venetians, in order to keep them in awe; and openly declared to them, as well as the Florentines, that he was determined to come into no terms with the Venetians, unless Pifa was deposited as the Florentines had proposed. THE inflexibility of Lewis on this head, created great

Lewis anites with uneafiness to his allies in Italy; and the pope himself was the Vene-amongst the first to counsel him to abandon the cause of the tians.

Florentines, rather than disoblige the Venetians, whose friendship was absolutely necessary for his conquering Milan. Lewis saw the cogency of those reasons, and yielded to them by concluding a treaty with the Venetians. This treaty obliged both them and the French to invade the Milanese at one time. Cremona and Ghiradadda were ceded to the Venetians; they were to be guarantied in the possession of their territory by Lewis; and they were, for a limited time, to keep on foot a body of troops for his service. Lewis was sensible that this treaty was inconsistent with his repeated professions, and he kept it so secret, that it was long before either the pope or the duke of Milan came to the knowledge of it. In the mean while, he talked to the Florentine deputies in a strain quite different from that which he had made use of before, which obliged them to enter into new connections with Sforza.

THE Venetians still kept possession of Bibienna, and had a War in the footing in the Casantin. Paul Vitelli was the Florentine gene. Casantin. ral against them. The Venetian generals were Carlo Orsino and Alviano. But the Florentines were so powerfully supported by the duke of Milan, and the mountaineers of the Casantin had such an aversion to the Venetians, that Vitelli found means to straiten their quarters in such a manner as to shut all their troops up in Bibienna, where they resolved to defend themselves to the last extremity. Had Sforza's advice been taken, the Venetian army at this time must have been irrecoverably ruined; but the Florentines were disheartened by the growing expence of the war, and unable to continue it.

COUNT Rinuccio, their former general, was at the head Conduct of of a party against Vitelli, who behaved with great arrogance Vitelli in his command, and affected a kind of independency on the Flothe civil government of Florence. He had even granted a rentine pass, without consulting them, to the duke of Urbino and general. Giulian de Medici, who were shut up in Bibienna; and in every other respect he behaved in a manner that shewed he did not think it for his interest to put an end to the war. The Venetians had applied to count Pitigliano, who had assembled some troops at Ravenna for the relief of Bibienna; and, by the dilatory conduct of Vitelli, he had advanced as far 23 Elci, a castle belonging to the duke of Urbino, on the Florentine borders. Vitelli, leaving a body of troops to block up Bibienna, marched to oppose him; and Pitigliano encountered such difficulties, that he resused to advance. While matters were thus in suspence, both parties entertained thoughts of peace; and, by the unwearied application of Sforza, the matter was referred to his father-in-law Ercole d'E/le, duke of Ferrara, who, for that purpose, repaired to Venice, to which city the Venetians fent, at the same time, Giovanni Battista Ridolfo, and Pagola Antonio Soderini, two persons of the first rank and character in their republic. At the opening of this congress, great debates happened whether Ercole many reasons to wish that he would act in the latter capacity, They knew that he was partial in favour of the Venetians, and that Sforza would facrifice every thing in order to bring the Venetians into a peace. The Venetians, on the other hand, were fo haughty as to declare, that they were for Ercole acting as an umpire, and pronouncing fentence; but that they would stand to no terms that should award the possession of Pila to the Florentines; and many of the senators insisted upon their republic's being reimbursed in the expences of the war, The more judicious part, however, of the Venetians entertained very different fentiments. They knew, that the Florentines had still great resources. They saw the difficulty and expense of retaining Pifa, and despaired of being able to relieve Bibienna. They confidered the affiliance they were to receive from France as being uncertain and precarious; and above all, they were alarmed with the preparations making by the Turks against their dominions in the Morea. Upon the who'e, therefore, they inclined to leave the matter entirely to Ercole's decision. Sforza seconded their opinion so too make of warmly, that he threatened to withdraw his troops from Tufcarry, if the Florentines did not confent to leave every thing to his ta, i cr-in-law's arbitration. The Florentines were obliged to fubmit, and the duke had eight days allowed him for drawing up his fentence. At last it was published, and imported, "That in eight days next enfuing, all hottilities should cease between the Florentines and the Venetians: that on St. Mark's day next, at faithest, the allies of both the Pifam and the Florentines should withdraw their troops out of Tufconv into their own territories; and particularly, that the Venetians should recal all their forces from Pifa and its territory, and evacuate Eibienna, with all other places taken from the Florentines, who, on their part, were to grant a full amnestly to the inhabitants of Bibienna for all offences: that, in confideration of the charges incurred by the Venetians, which they estimated at no less than eight hundred thousand ducats, the Florentines should pay them fifteen thousand ducats yearly for the term of twelve years: that the Pisans should have full power and free liberty to exercise any trade or calling, both by land or fea: that they should continue in possession of the castles of Pisa and other places which they held at the time of passing this decision, and might garrison them with Pilans or foreigners, provided they were not of any state sufpailed by the Florentines: that their garrisons should be paid out of the taxes raised by the Florentines on the Pisans; but that no larger fums should be levied, nor more standing

912 Florentines Ju! mi! to Ferrara's

arcitraticu.

roops maintained, than was practifed before the rebellion: hat the Pifans should be permitted to demolish all the castles nd fortified places in their territory, which they had taken rom the Florentines, while they were under the protection of he Venetians: that in Pisa the chief justice in civil cases hould be a foreigner, elected by the Pisans themselves, out of a country not obnoxious to the Florentines; and that a jutice, commissioned by the Florentines, might have power to eccive appeals, but not in criminal cases where death, bainfluent, or confiscation were concerned, without the preence of an affiftant justice or affessor, commissioned by Ercole, or his fuccessors, to be elected by him or them out of five zivilians of the dutchy of Ferrara, nominated by the Fisans: that all goods moveable and immoveable should be restored on both fides, but without any allowance for interest. In all other cases the Florentines might affert their rights in the Pifan; and the Pisans were to engage for the suture not to take up arms against the Florentines on any account whatfoever."

· This decision equally disgusted all parties, and the duke His deciof Ferrara was personally insulted by the Venetians. The Pi-fion Jans were the loudest in their complaints that they had been displeases betrayed by the Venetians; that they might have obtained all parties. better terms of the Florentines themselves; that the concesfions in their favour were only in appearance; and that they were now reduced to a state of greater slavery than ever to the Florentines. Those discontents arose to such a height as to oblige Ercole, who was apprehensive for the safety of his own person, to make an explanatory addition to his sentence in favour of the Pisans; and the Venetians ratified the same, by immediately withdrawing all their troops from Tufcary. The Florentines were, if possible, more disgusted than either the Pifans or the Venetians were, at the duke's award. They complained of being obliged to reimburse the charges of the war, and, in fact, to forego all their rights of sovereignty over the Pifans. They, however, were quieted, by Sforza's threatening to ratify the duke's decree; but it does not ap-Pear that they ever ratified the explanatory addition. The Pilans, for some time, debated whether they should accept Or not accept of the award; and fuch was their hatred of the Florentines, that rather than submit to them they offered to become subject to Sforza; but he declined the tender. The Pifans, thus disappointed, resolved to stand all extremities, Pather than again return to the Florentine yoke, which Obliged the Florentines to order their general Vitelli to · marchmarch with his army into the Pifan, and to endeavour to res

duce that city by force.

Sforza's diftres.

10 1be Turks.

THE duke of Ferrara's decree, though effected by Sforzai was so far from reconciling the Venetians to him, that they were more than ever determined on his ruin. Sforza had recourse to Maximilian, who was perpetually draining him of money, without doing him the smallest service, and who was himself at this time engaged in a war with the Swifs. Lewis the French king availed himself of this disposition of affairs; and now prepared in earnest for his Italian expedition. He fent some money to the Swiss, to enable them to make head against Maximilian, who was the only support that Sfarza could rely on. Sforza, upon this, fought to unite himself to He applies the pope, the Florentines, and Federigo king of Naples. But all his proposals for that purpose proved in vain; and at last he was driven to apply for affiftance to Bajazet the emperor of the Turks, as being the most likely power to give a diversion to the Venetians. This application not having the defired effect, he offered to affist the Florentines in the reduction of Pi/a, on condition, when that was effected, of their affifting him with three hundred men at arms, and two thoufand foot, for the defence of his dominions. Lewis the French king applied to the Florentines at the fame time and to the same purpose: he required of their state a regiment of five hundred men at arms for a year; on which condition he promised to affist them with one thousand lances for the fame time, and to make no peace with Sforza till they were put into possession of Pifa. The Florentines were puzzled how to act under such circumstances; but, after weighing all arguments, they determined to remain neutral, and to push the conquest of Pisa upon their own bottom. They had, however, reasons for keeping well with Sforza, and civilly declined entering into any treaty with him till they were in possession of Pifa, as it could be of service to neither party for Florence to draw upon herself the resentment of the Frencis.

> Thus Sforza was deserted on all hands. His usurpation, and the injustice done to his nephew and family, together with his noted infincerity in all his actions, had rendered his name a public nuisance; and he was now abandoned even by his father-in law the duke of Ferrara, who pretended that he durst not disoblige the Venetians. Sforza, being thus driven to depend upon himself alone, fortified his frontier towns of Anon, Novara, and Alessandria. He ordered one part of his army, under Galeazzo Sanseverino, to oppose the

French,

French, and another, under the marquis of Mantua, against the Venetians. The Turks, by this time, had declared war against that republic; and Sforza, depending on that diverfion, was imprudent enough, not only to countermand the march of the marquis, but to give him some personal provocations, which obliged him to leave his service. The encrease of the Venetian troops in the Brescian, soon rendered him fensible of his mistake, and he again applied to his fatherin-law the duke of Ferrara, to make up matters between him and the marquis of Mantua; but it was out of the power of that marquis now to do him any service. The duke of Savoy had signed a treaty with the French king, and French troops were daily pouring into Italy. Lewis, understanding that The war there was fill a tampering between Sforza and the Floren-continues in tines, talked in such high terms to the ambassadors of the Lombarlatter, that he obliged the republic to fign a treaty, by which dy, the engaged not to affift Sforza, who, at the fame time, was disappointed by the king of Naples, whose interest it undoubtedly was to have affifted him. Sforza then endeavoured to make peace between Maximilian and the Swifs. They had promifed to affift him with a large army; and, to gain time, he ordered Galeazzo to pass the Po with sixteen hundred lances, fifteen hundred horse, and ten thousand Italian, and five Hundred German foot; but to keep upon the defensive. The French army rendezvouled at Afti, confishing of two thousand fix hundred lances, five thousand Swift, four thoufand Gascons, and four thousand other French, commanded by d'Aubigny, Trivulzi, and Ligni. Their success was rapid. On the thirteenth of August they took Arezzo. Anon made but a feeble refistance. Valenza was betrayed to them; and Galeazzo, finding he could have no dependence upon his Italian infantry, shut himself up in Alessandria. Basingano, Voghiera, Castelnuovo, Ponte Corono, and at last the important town and citadel of Tortona, fell into the hands of the French. After that, they penetrated into the Ghiradadda. The condition of Sforza was now desperate. He had, in vain, endeavoured to retrieve his credit with the inhabitants of Milan; and he was betrayed by his general Cajazzo, who went over to the French. In like manner, Galeazzo his brother abandoned Alessandria, which the French took and plundered; and Pavia declared for them. Sforza then resolved to retire with his family to Germany, after leaving a garrison in the castle of Milan, which, with the city, opened its gates to the French; as did Genoa: whilst Cremona submitted to the Venetians; and Lewis himself took possession of Milan.

and in the Pilan.

PAUL VITELLI, during those successes of the French was making war in the Pifan, where he reduced Cafaina, and at last shut the Pifans up within their city, which was besieged by Vitelli. Pisa was surrounded with a single but a strong wall, and was formidable by the number and courage of its inhabitants, whom practice had now rendered excellent foldiers. Vitelli played with his cannon upon Stampau, one of the outworks, which was defended by Gurlino the Pisan general, and shattered it so, that he took it by storm. Being at the head of ten thousand foot, and a proportionable number of horse, he might have taken the city at the same time with very little loss; but he unaccountably stopped the ardour of his troops, upon which the Pifans recovered from their consternation, and defended themselves more obstinately than ever. It was now the end of August, and the unwholsome situation of Pisa had filled the Florentine army with diseases, which cut so many of them off, that Vitelli, apprehensive of being himself attacked, abandoned the siege, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the Florentine officers and soldiers. This disappointment proved his ruin. In a few days after he was arrested at Cascina, from whence he was sent to Florence where he was put to the torture. The charges against him were various and complicated; but perhaps his want of success was his greatest crime. Amongst other things, he was accused of holding a correspondence with the Pisans and the Medici family, and of having privately engaged himself in the Venetian service. He confessed nothing upon the rack, and next day he was beheaded. The Florentine magistrates endeavoured to seize his brother Vitellozzo, who would have undergone the same fate, but by the fidelity of his attendants he escaped to Pisa, where he was joyfully received.

Vitelli
tortured
and bebeaded.

Treaty between Lewis and the Florentines. AFTER the French king had triumphantly entered Milan, all the Italian states, excepting the king of Naples, made court to him, and he received the compliments of them all more savourably than he did those of Florence. Lewis thought that the conduct of the Florentines was timid and time-serving; and they scarcely ever made a poorer figure than they did at this period, being hated and despised by all their neighbours, for their temporizing. Their enemies the Pisans, on the other hand, were every where in the highest reputation, for the noble stand they had made in desence of their liberties: and the Florentines met with a severe enemy in the person of Trivulzi, who was in hopes of obtaining the sovereignty of Pisa, where the inhabitants were ready for any subjection but to the Florentines. The cruel death which Vitelli, whose reputa-

ition as an officer was very high, had undergone, ind the public odium against the Florentines, and they feviled at the French court, for having unjustly put to a general, who was the friend and confederate of e. Reasons of state, however, favoured the Florentines; ewis consulting his interest more than he did the reents of his courtiers, entered into a treaty with them, afey had previously made him a handsome present in The terms were, that the king should assist them t all invaders with fix hundred lances and four thousand that he should employ the lances, and a proportionable of artillery, in the recovery of Pifa, and of the lands rritories that had been taken from them by the Siennese le Lucquese. The Florentines, on the other hand, ento employ four hundred men at arms, and three thoupot, in defence of his majesty's Italian dominions; and was recovered, they were to join the royal army with indred men at arms, and advance b fifty thousand ducars Is the maintenance of five thousand Swift for three is, besides repayment of thirty-six thousand ducats lent by Lodovico, deducting from the faid fum what Trivulzi declare to have been paid or expended on his account. , that they should elect for their captain-general the t of Rome, who was brother to the cardinal of S. Piero, cola, at whose instance this demand was made. 18 treaty between the French king and the Florentines Design of immediate consequences, the Italian potentates hav-the pope nost all of them separate views. After the reduction of and his , the pope prevailed with Lewis to lend him a body of fin. , for the reduction, as he pretended, of the Romagna to ly see; but in fact, for erecling a powerful principaere in favour of his fon Cefar Borgia, in which he succeeded. The Venetians were obliged to turn their on against the Turks, who besieged their maritime in Greece, where it was thought they were betrayed by admiral Antonio Grimano. As to the French king, he e government of the Milanese under Trivulzi, and reto France. Sforza, and his brother the cardinal A/were all this while at Maximilian's court, and fed with ficent promises of his employing a great army in their . It foon appeared, however, that all his intention iget money from them; on which they refolved to apanother quarter for relief. They happened to be fa-

I by the perpetual disagreement between the Italian and

b Guicciardini, book iv.

French manners. Trivulzi was unamiable in his characleh and guilty of some cruelties, which rendered him unpopular in Milan. The insolence of the French, in a few weeks, became more odious to the Milanese, than all the crimes and oppressions of Sforza had ever been; and they every day He accordingly, made secret applications for his return. with the money that was left him, hired eight hundred Swift and five hundred Burgundian men at arms; and returning to the Milanese, notwithstanding all the vigilance of Trivulzia he and his brother made themselves masters of Come. All that Trivalzi could do, was to fend expresses to Venice for asfistance, and to recal the French troops that were ferving in the Romagna.

Sforza re-

Bur the inhabitants of Milan had, by this time, heard of covers the Sforza's success at Como; which gave them such spirits, that Milanese. they in a manner drove Trivulzi out of Milan to Novara, where he endeavoured to make a fland, till he could receive reinforcements out of France. Upon this, Sforza and his brother were joyfully received in Milan; and had it not been for the Venetians, all that duchy would have declared for him, as Pisa and Parma actually did. After Sforza became master of Milan, he left no measure untried for securing himself in the possession of it. He sent the bishop of Cremona to the Venetians, offering to agree to any terms they should prescribe for effecting a reconciliation: but all his endeavours were fruitless, they refusing to abandon their alliance with France. The Genzese were applied to in like manner: but could not be prevailed upon to return under Sforza's government; and the Florentines, who certainly lay under great obligations to him, refused to pay him the money he had advanced them towards the recovery of Pifa. The marquis of Mantua, however, and the lords of Mirandola, Carpi, and Correggio, lent him some men, and the Siennese affisted him with a fum of money. He likewise received some aids from other Italian princes; so that at last he raised a considerable army of Swifs, Burgundians, and Italians, and leaving his brother, the cardinal, to beliege the castle of Milan, he himfelf laid siege to Novara; the French under Trivulzi having thut themselves up in Mortara, which began to be distressed for want of provisions. In the mean while Ivo d' Allegri, who commanded the French troops that were ferving in the Romagna, returned to Aleffandria; but the French king had taken so little care of his conquests and troops, that the Swifs under Allegri, daily deserted to Sforza for want of pay. enabled him to take the town of Novara, tho' the citadel still held out; and it is thought that if Sforza had pursued his good fortune, the French must have been obliged to repair the Po.

LEWIS, the French king, stung with so many repeated He is bedifgraces, disparched Tremouille with fix hundred lances for trayed and Italy. By the month of April, in the year 1500, he had in given up Italy fifteen hundred lances, ten thousand Swifs, and fix by bis thousand French. The Swifs in Sforza's army now departed Swifs solfrom that honest open character for which they had ever been diers. The French, winking at their defertion to Sforza, fuffered many of their officers to go over, whom they knew to be attached to their service. As those officers had no beject of duty but money, they caballed with their countrymen in Sforza's army; and at last a plot was formed to make their peace with the French king, by deferting Sforza. latter had some intimation of the conspiracy; and ordered four hundred horse and eight hundred soot to march from Milan to Novara, as a reinforcement to his army. The conspirators, understanding this, mutinied for want of pay; and Sforza, in order to appeale them, had recourse to the most abject submissions, and made them a present of all his plate, till money could be brought from Milan. The Swift officers, however, who were in the fecret of the conspiracy, prevailed with the French to present themselves in array before Nevara, and took measures for cutting off all communication between Sforza and Milan: He had great reason to think he was betrayed, and drew his army out to fight the French; but the Swift flatly refused to engage, pretending they could bot fight against their own countrymen. In short, though Sforma descended to the most abject entreaties to prevail upon them to stand by him, they continued in their resolution of iteturning to their own country; and all he could obtain was a chance for his escaping out of the hands of the French in the disguise of a common Swifs soldier. This was the miferable expedient left to the most refined politician of his age for fafety, and it even failed him. While the Swifs were perfing through the French army, Sforza was known, probably being betrayed by the Swiss themselves, and immediately put under arrest, as were all his friends and relations, who atgended him in the same disguise. This humiliating reverse of fortune drew teats even from Sforza's enemies. His brother Ascanie was equally unfortunate: hearing of Sforza's fate he abandoned Milan; but in endeavouring to make his escape, he was betrayed in the Piacentine, and fent prisoner to Venice. The French king demanded him of the Venetians, who were mean enough to deliver him up, together with all the Milanese noblemen of Sferza's party, who had put them-C c 2 felves.

felves under their protection, on a promise of not being delivered up. As to Sforza, he was conducted to Lions, and from thence fent prisoner to several places; but at last he was fixed at Loches, where, according to the French historian, he was treated with respect; and he there lived for ten years. during the last five of which he was allowed to walk abroad, within five miles of the castle. His brother, the cardinal, was confined at Bourges. The Florentines were but indirectly concerned in those great events. The emperor and the empire of Germany, conceived umbrage at the vast successes of the French king; for which reason he laid aside all thoughts of carrying his arms into Naples, and inclined to give the Florentines affiftance towards recovering Pifa and Pietra Santa. The Genoese, Siennese, and Lucquese, out of hatred to the Florentines, tempted Lewis with great offers to lay aside his design; and being seconded by Trivulzi, and some of his generals, he was for some time in suspence. The cardinal of Rouen was then at Milan, and took the part of the Flurentines, who had, with the utmost honour and punctuality. fulfilled all their engagements with the French. He therefore fent them a reinforcement of fix hundred lances and five thousand Swift, with some companies of Gascons, artillery, and ammunition, and a further supplement of two thousand Swift followed them. But the licentiousness of the French mercenasies defeated all the intentions of the cardinal; they Missendust loitered their time away in Lombardy, and gave the Pilon leifure to prepare for their defence. The Florentines themselves were partly to blame for their misfortunes; for at their recommendation Beaumont, a Frenchman of no experience in military affairs, was made general of the French auxiliaries; and instead of proceeding to the siege of Pila, he made war up on the marquis of Mantua, Bentivoglio of Bologna, and other petty lords and potentates who had favoured Sforza.

of the French,

anpo pita

THE Pisans had made Vitellozzo, brother to Paul Vitellis the Pisans, their general, and he put their city in a respectable posture of defence. Such was the hatred of the inhabitants to the Florentines, that the women, equally as the men, laboured on the fortifications. The inhabitants even passed a public decree, putting themselves under the French protection, declaring themselves French subjects. This being intimated to Beaumont, he demanded pollession of their city, which they would have granted him, had he been empowered to promise, that they should not again come under subjection to the Florentines. Beaumont having no instructions on the head, laid siege to Pisa; but it was so well prepared for ! defence, and the Pifans expressed so much resolution, that thre beliegers despaired of success. The siege soon languished; and by an intercourse, not uncommon in those days, the French became acquainted with the Pisans, and pitied them, as fuffering in the noblest of causes that of defending their liberty. This compassion went even to an extravagant length. for not only the French foldiers, but some of their officers of the highest rank, far from distressing the Pilans, suffered their auxiliaries to enter their city; and at last, under pretence of not receiving their pay, they mutinied against their officers. and broke up the siege, leaving the sew Florentines who had joined them to continue it.

WHEN the French retired from the flege of Pifa, the Pi- who take fans undertook the fiege of Librafatta; which they foon re-Librafat-

duced, as they did Ventura, and several other places, all of ta. shem ferving to open a communication between them and Lucca. The French generals, in the mean while, carefully concealed from Lewis their own scandalous behaviour, and that of their troops, but laid all the blame upon the Florentines, who, they faid, had made an improper choice of a genezal, and had not supplied the French with provisions. Lewis. however, endeavoured to encourage the Florentines to reassume the siege of Pifa; but they became now so dissident of the French, that they refused to have any connections with them, while the Genoese, the Siennese, and the Lucquese, openly affished the Pisans both with men and money.

NOTHING material happened, farther than what we have The Florelated, amongst the Florentines, during the year 1500. They rentines were, through their connections with the French, very low reduced in the esteem of all the other Italian states; and Lewis, tho' low. himself well-intentioned, was, by his favourites and courtiers, prevailed on to abandon them to their fate, and to apply his chief efforts in favour of the pope, and his son, Cesar Bergia, who now made vast progress in the Romagna. To complete the misfortune of the Florentines, they had engaged to pay to Lewis the money that they had borrowed from Sforza. But the successes of Borgia encouraged him to turn his eyes cowards the Florentines, who having now every thing to dread from his and his father's ambition, not only failed in paying Sforza's debt to Lewis, but in discharging the arrears due to the Swiss who had been employed in the siege of Pisa, which :Lewis, rather than disoblige the Swiss, had advanced out of his own coffers. All this gave Lewis a very indifferent opinion of the Florentines; so that he was, with some difficulty, prevailed upon to put off the term of payment for some time.

THE Plarentines, instead of thinking on the means of rac Freems trieving their affairs, split amongst themselves; and the more themselves desperate their situation became, their divisions grew to the greater height. The popular form of government, which had taken place ever fince the expulsion of Peter de Media, became now a burden to them, and part of them were for restoring the Medici family; others inclined to a moderate aristocracy; the wifer part declined all concern in the state; and none were found who had interest enough either to reform, or to settle, the government. Liquis, the French king, came at last to hold the Florentines in great contempt. He fisted upon the payment of the money due to him, and the affiltance they had stipulated to afford him in his Neopolitan expedition, and being disappointed in both, he gave his ratronage to the family of Medici, and entered upon measure for restoring them to their influence in Florence. In this he was seconded by Cesar Borgia, who equally ungrateful as ambitious, had, during his progress in the Romagne, been greatly affished by the Florentines; but Borgia being now prosperous in all his undertakings, had even thoughts of making himself master of Florence. The French king began to disike his conduct, and had prohibited an attempt which he had formed against Bologna. Borgia knew that Lewis was immefurably exasperated against the Florentines; and being secun of receiving no check from him on their account, he actually invaded their dominions with five or fix thousand men, under on the borders of Tuscany.

Insulted by BORGIA had no serious intention of serving the Medici
Cesar family; but according to Guiceiardini, he even indulged a Borgia. private resentment he had for the Florentines, and servanced within six miles of their city with his army. Being doubtful of the French, he there stopped and repretence of demanding a passage through them. But without waiting for any answer to this demand, he preceded in his march as far as Barbarino, a market town, and the original place of the Barbarino samily; where, the he had no artillery with him, and though his army was in a miserable condition, he altered his strain, and in the stile of a sovereign prince, he demanded of the Florentines that they would enter into a treaty with him, and not only give him a subside according to his rank and dignity, but alter the form of their government to his liking. To give the greater weight to this demand, he had ordered Peter de Medici, Vitellozzo, the Orsini, and other declared enemies of the Florentines, to lis newed his demands upon the Florentines, who were in no condition to dispute them. A convention was accordingly entered into between them and Borgia, by which he promised to give no affishance to the Pisans; and they agreed not to oppose his designs upon Piombino, or the other states he intended to subdue. The Florentines were likewise obliged to pay him a subsidy of thirty-six thousand ducats yearly, on condition of his keeping three hundred men at arms, always in readiness for their service. The more compliant the Florentines were, Borgia grew the more insolent: he treated their country as that of an enemy, and rose exorbitantly in his demands.

[.] Guicciardini, book v.

Few readers who are acquainted with history, are igno- rube is rant of the character of Cefar Borgia; and it feems not to checked by have been unknown to the French of those days. Tho' Lewis Lewis. both hated and despised the Florentines, yet he was so far from approving of Borgia's insolence towards them, that he fent orders to D'Aubigny, his general in Lombardy, to drive him out of Tuscany, if he did not retire of himself. Borgia was intimidated by this threat, and ordered the Pilans to abandon the siege of Ripomaranci, a place belonging to the Florentines, which he had encouraged them to undertake. But the fystem of power in Italy was at this time intirely overturned. Ferdinand the Catholic, king of Spain, the most politic prince of his age, had formed a treaty of partition of the kingdom of Naples, unknown to Federigo, who depended upon the affistance of Gonsalva, the Spanish general, who in history is known by the name of the Great Captain. The French troops entered Naples, and then the French and Spanish ambasfadors, by command of their masters, published at the court of Rome the treaty of partition which had been concluded, and obliged his holiness to give them investitures according to its articles, under pretence that, when the partition took place, they should be enabled to act with greater effect against the infidels. It is certain, that in this partition Lewis was outwitted by Ferdinand. Federigo had offered to put himself and his kingdom under the protection of France; but Lewis vainly imagined that he might, by his treaty with Ferdinand, become quiet possessor of half the kingdom of Naples. infamy, however, fell most heavily upon Ferdinand. "true that Federige was descended of a bastard line; but Ferdinand had all along promised to support and assist him. Ferdinand had nothing to plead in his own behalf, but that Federigo, unknown to him, was negotiating an alliance with France, which, had it taken place, must have endangered his kingdom of Sicily; and that Federigo, being of an illegitimate family, Cc4 family, had, in fact, no right to the kingdom of Naples. It was some time before Federigo could be brought to believe he had been betrayed; but the march of d'Aubigny the French general, and his belieging Capua, which he took and facked, foon undeceived him. It is well known, that the French and Spaniards succeeded in their designs against Naples. Florentines, in a fit of despair, applied to the cardinal of Rouce for making the French king their friend; but, instead of that, he gave up to the Lucquese, for a sum of money, Pietra Santa and Mutrone. He likewise entered into a treaty with the Siennele, the Lucquele, and the Pilans, for restoring the family of Medici to their power in Florence. But money being his only object, the negociation came to nothing, as foon as he perceived those states were unable to advance it. neither the Florentines nor Pisans were able to bestir themtelves, the great powers on which each depended being intent on other objects; but in the year 1502, hostilities were renewed between them. The Florentines had taken advantage of Maximilian's jealousy of the French, to make some advances towards a treaty with him; and Lewis was so apprehensive of the consequences, that he began to talk in a very moderate strain to the Florentines, so that, at last, a treaty was concluded The terms, according to Guicciardini a, were, between them. "That the king, on receiving them into his protection, Treaty berween tines.

392

Affairs of Naples.

Lewis and " should be bound, for three years next ensuing, to defend the Floren- "them with an armed force, at his own cost, against any " power that should, either directly or indirectly, attack "them in the dominions of which they were then in posses-" fion: that the Florentines should be obliged, in the said " space of three years, to pay each year the third part of one "hundred and twenty thousand ducats: that all other capi-" tulations made between them, together with the obligations "depending on them, should be null and void: that the Fla-" rentines should be at liberty to proceed by force of arms " against the Pisans, and all other invaders of their state."

quar rene wed.

THIS treaty gave fresh spirits to the Florentines, and they refumed their war against the Pilans. Experience, by this The Pisan time, had taught them the inutility of endeavouring to reduce Pifa by force of arms; and they therefore made dispositions for taking Vice Pisano, and blockading Pisa itself, in such a manner as to compel it to furrender by famine. Maximilian, out of hatred and jealousy towards the French king, now took the part of the Pisans; and the faction of the Medici was fo strong, that every day produced turnults in their favour. Guglielmo de Pazzi was then the Florentine governor in Arezzo, where Vitellozzo, the implacable enemy of the Florentines, on account of his brother, had a strong party. The governor had an intimation of a conspiracy against him; but neglected it so much, that the Arezzians, who now hated the Florentines, broke out into open rebellion, imprisoned the governor, took possession of the city, and forced the Florentines to betake themselves to the citadel. All this was done with so much rapidity, that Vitellozzo had only leifure to throw a few troops into Arezzo, for blockading the citadel. The Florentine army, at this time, were befieging Vico Pisano; and the wifest citizens gave it as their opinion, that it ought to march to Arezzo, preferably to all other fervices; but the introduction of low-bred mechanics into the principal posts of the goyernment, rendered the Florentines deaf to all public counsel; and Vitellozzo, marching with a fresh reinforcement to Arezzo, blocked up the citadel in such a manner, that the garrison Arezzo could receive no provisions, so that it was obliged to surrender lost by capitulation. By the terms of it, the bishop of Arezzo, who had thut himself up in the citadel, and eight other Florentines, were to be detained prisoners, and exchanged for the Arezzians who had been imprisoned at Florence.

THE Florentines were under the greater consternation at the loss of Arezzo, as they imagined that it had been effected by by the Flothe contrivance of the pope and his fon Cafar Borgia. They rentines. had no recourse, being now destitute both of men and money, but to the French king; to whom they represented the danger of the increase of the papal power in Italy, and the necessity he was under, both for his interest and honour, to take Florence into his protection. Lewis, who had long disliked the proceedings of the pope and his fon, and who had now broken with the king of Spain about the partition of Naples, ordered his general Chaumont to march with a strong detachment to the affishance of the Fiorentines; and sent commands to Vitellozzo. the Orsini, Borgia, and other enemies of the Florentines, upon pain of his displeasure, to desist from all hostilities against This order was complied with; but Borgia, in the mean while, after a train of treacherous and inhuman meafures, took possession of the dutchy of Urbino; and then deliberated, as he was now very strong, upon attacking the Florentines, in defiance of the French king. Prudential confiderations, however, restrained him from that; and he contented himself with amusing the Florentines by a negotiation. and suffering their enemy Vitellozzo to take the citadel of Arezzo, and many other places belonging to the Florentines in the neighbourhood. Even Cortina fell into his hands; for the Flo-

Florentines were now so weak, that they were unable to bring an army into the field; and the presence of Peter de Medica in his army, made the subjects of Florence, without its gates, confider all who opposed him as so many rebels.

ger.

HAD Vitellozzo marched into the Cafantine, after such a Their dan-train of successes, he might have endangered Florence itself. Instead of that, he reduced Anghiari and Bargo S. Sepolchro. From thence he marched into the Cafantine: but by this time two hundred French lances, under Imbault, had arrived in the Florentine territory; the dread of whom obliged Vitellouze to abandon his design upon the Casantine. A reinforcement of two hundred other French lances arriving, the Florentines affembled an army of three thousand foot, and forced Vitellazze to retire under the walls of Arezze. The face of affairs was now greatly altered in favour of the Florentines. Most of Vitellozzo's confederates drew off, to fecure their own countries against Borgia, and the French king was now arrived at Asi; from whence he detached his general, Louis de la Tremouille, with a large body of troops, to affift the Florentines in recovering Arezze, and in opposing the progress of the papel power; a service which he declared to be as meritorious as that of fighting against the infidels.

Views of ibe pape.

THE pope and his fon, knowing that they were no match for the French king, disclaimed having any hand in the revolt of Arezzo, and threatened Vitellozzo with their displeasure, if he did not abandon it. He chose a middle course; and, to the great disappointment of the Florentines, he gave Areas, and the other places he had taken from them, into the hands of Imbault the French general, who, by order of the French king, immediately restored them to the Florentines. this agreeable event cost the Florentines money, yet it gave them such a sense of their own importance, that they resolved to new-model the form of their government, that they might, if possible, revive a public spirit in their commonwealth. But the disadvantages they experienced from their popular method of government, and their prepossessions in its favour were so equally ballanced, that they could agree only upon one alteration, which was, that of making the gonfalonier an officer Peter Soderini, an unexceptionable person, was during life. unanimously chosen to fill that high office. When the French king arrived at Afti, his minister, the cardinal of Rough &conded the arts of the pope so effectually, that they were reconciled together, to prevent the junction of his holiness with Maximilian. This negociation was kept so secret, that all Italy was amazed at seeing Borgia received by the French king with open arms at Milan, and at his majesty's recalling his trcops traops from Tuscany, in order to employ them in Naples, 97. where he was every where victorious, and obliged the Spanish French general Gensalvo to shut himself up in Barletta, Lewis was again ineven to weak, that, by the advice of the cardinal of Rouen, wade Italy. who aspired to the popedom, in case of a vacancy, he entered into closer connections than ever with the pope and Borgia, who perfused in disclaiming all the proceedings of Vitellozzo against the Florentines. This gave great umbrage to the Florentines, and all the other states of Italy; and they endeavoured to take the marquis of Mantua into their pay; but in this they were opposed by the French king, as well as by the pope The two latter became now so insolent, on the and Bergia. favour of Lewis, that they made no secret of their enmity to the Florentines, and even repented the disclaiming their having had any hand in the revolt of Arezzo. Their influence over Lewis was such, that he permitted them to make an attempt upon Belegna, though he had before declared that he would maintain the Bentiuoglia family there. The Florentines were at this time so inconsiderable, as to despair of doing any service by their remonstrances. But the Venetians infifted, with great farmacis, upon the mistaken policy of Lewis in aggrandizing the pope and his family.

THOSE representations gave courage to the lesser Italian Confederaprinces. Pagelo Orfini, Vitellozzo, Gian Pagolo Baglione, Li-cy among ft queretto da Fermo, Giovanni Bentivoglio, and others, seeing their the Italian estates, which they had so long possessed as field, ready to fall powers a facrifice to the ambition of the pope and his son, withdrew against the themselves from their service, and entered into a consederacy pope and for their mutual defence against Borgia; but they avoided. as Borgia. much as possible, to give any umbrage to the French king. To bring the Florentines into their alliance, they offered, by means of Pandolfe Petrucci, to restore them to the possession of Pisa; but the Florentines declined the proposal, for sear of disobliging the French king, who still continued to be attached to the pope, This disconcerted all the measures of the consederates. and, one after another, they made their peace with his holiness and Borgia. But that monster, in defiance of the most folemn engagements, having decoyed four of the principal confederates, Pagelo Orsini, the duke of Gravina, Vitellozzo. and Liverette de Ferme, into his power, he put Vitellezzo and Liverette da Ferme to death, and made the others pri-

In the beginning of the year 1503, his holiness and his son, in like manner, decoyed into their power cardinal Orfine and almost all his family, whom they eather put to death or imprisoned; and in all their proceedings they continued to behave behave with such insolence and cruelty, that the French king became once more jealous of them; and a league of mutual offence and desence was formed amongst the Florentines, the Siennese, and the Bolognese, against the pope and his family. By this league, of which the French king was the guarantee, Monte Pulciano was to be restored to the Florentines; and Pandolso Petrucci was restored to Sienna, from whence he had been expelled by Borgia. This return of the savour of Lewis was the less useful to the Florentines, on account of the declining state of their affairs in Naples, where the war was carried on in a romantic manner; and even the Swiss began to lose their respect for the French king, who now thought of nothing but withdrawing with honour from his Neapolitan expedition.

The Florentines jain the French.

THE Florentines, all this while, were intent upon the recovery of Pisa, and had taken into their service the bailiff of Caen, a French officer of reputation, who took Vice Pisane from the Pisans, and soon after Verrucola, a pass of great importance towards the conquest of Pisa itself. The loss of those two places were extremely mortifying to the Pisans, who were now abandoned by all their allies, and had nothing to support them but their irreconcileable aversion towards the Jealoufy, however, operated in their favour. Florentines. The Genoese and Lucquese, conscious that they had no favour to expect from the Florentines, gave them affiftance; and Borgia himself, encouraged by the ruin of the Frenth in Naples, privately affifted them, in hopes of becoming their fovereign. Pandolfo Petrucci likewise entered into intrigues against the Florentines, who insisted upon the restitution of Monte Pulciano, previous to all other confiderations. Lewis made a fresh irruption into Italy, in which he was affished by the Florentines, and the other states of Tuscany; and, by intercepted letters, it was discovered that Borgia, and Gonsalvo, the Spanish general in Naples, had entered into engagements for making the former fovereign of Pifa, and for defeating all the hopes of the French in Italy. The preparations of Lewis were so formidable, that they durst not carry those engagements immediately into execution; and, after various negociations, the pope agreed to remain neutral as to all disputes in Tuscany; and at the same time Borgia confented to affift the French with a body of troops. But those engagements were all deceitful, on the part of his holiness and his son, whose real intention was to carry into execution their views upon Tuscany, as soon as the French army was engaged in Naples. Their treachery was difappointed appointed by the death of the pope, which, according to Death of the authorities of the best historians, was occasioned by sope Alexhis casually drinking part of a poisoned bottle of wine he anderhad prepared to be administered to some rich eardinals who were to sup with him (A). His fon Cæsar Borgia drunk of the same bottle, and narrowly escaped with his life. The confusion that happened in Rome upon the death of pope Alexander VI. who, notwithstanding his crimes, was one of the greatest men that ever filled the papal throne, is inexpressible. At last, the cardinals fixed upon Francisco Piccolomini, cardinal of Sienna, to be pope. He lived but twentyfix days after his election, and was succeeded by the cardinal of St. Piero in Vincola, the most turbulent spirit of his age, who assumed the name of Julius II. The ambition of the Venetians at this time, led them to attack Faenza; and the Faventines had recourse first to the pope, who refused to defend them, and then to the Florentines, who, at first, sent them some assistance, but soon after withdrew it, dreading the Venetian power, which was so great at this time, that they made flight both of the pope and the French king, who had charged them to defift from attacking Faenza, which belonged to Cafar Borgia. Notwithstanding this, they not only took the place, but stripped him of most of his possesfions in the Romagna. He was an eminent instance of the vanity of human politics. He used to boast, that he had omitted no precaution to secure himself in the possession of the effates he had acquired, only he had not foreseen that he might be taken ill at the time of his father's death, which was the case. As he was univerfally detested, the pope sinished his ruin, which the Venetians had begun. estates reverted either to them or to the church; and the remains of his miserable army at last took refuge in the Florentine territory, where they were difarmed and stripped.

THE French army, at this time, were totally defeated in The Naples by Gonfalvo, who secured all that kingdom to the French deking of Spain. Peter de Medici, who had followed the for-feated in by the best cotemporary histoheve them to have been mistaken or misinformed. Voltaire notwithstanding the romantic circumstances attending it, it fortunes. has all the marks of historical

(A) This is the account given credibility that can be required. To mention no other, the illrians, some of whom were upon ness of Cæsar Borgia at the the spot, and we can scarce be- same time, and from the same cause, has never been disputed, and is allowed to have been the thinks it to be improbable; but reason of the ruin that afterwards befel himself and his tunes of France, was drowned in endeavouring to pass the Garigliano in a boat; and Caefar Borgia, after experiencing great vicillitudes of fortune, was arrested by Gonfalvo, and fent prisoner to Spain. In the year 1504, Gonfalve having flackened the profecution of his victories over the French, the Florentines obtained some little respite; but were soon after threatened with an invalion by the friends of the Medici family, who were still numerous and powerful. It appeared, however, that the Spaniards, who were every where victorious, intended to give them no disturbance; which encouraged them in the lummer of that year to take into their pay Gian Pagolo Baglione, with some other Halian soldiers of fortune, and to renew the war with the Pilans. They accordingly entered that territory with a great army, and laid it waste. It was expected, that, being still in friendship with the French king, Gonfalvo would have given them forme tronble; but both parties proved tractable on that head; and entered into a kind of a compromise, by which the Plarentines engaged not to affift the French king if he should again attack Naples, while Gonfalvo was not to moleft them in the country of Pila, unless they undertook the siege of that city while they continued in friendship with France. The Florentines pursued their advantages, and took Librafatta after a short refistance, together with a great number of places in the neighbourhood of Pifa itself. Notwithstanding their compromise with Gonsalvo, they would have even taken that city, had it not been succoured by the Genoese and the Lucquese. Giacomini, the Florentine general, upon this invaded the territory of Lucca, which he laid waste; and the Lucquese complained of him to the French king, who gave them no failfaction; so that Pisa was still in imminent danger from the Florentines. Gonfalvo perceiving this, fent one of his officers, Rimeri della Sassetta, with two hundred horse, to Pisa, into which the Genoese, at the same time, threw one thousand foot. One Bardella, of Porto Venere, a famous corfair, entered likewise into the Pisan service, on assurance of being paid by the Genoese and their confederates; and supplied them with provisions, at a time when they were threatened with famine, by keeping a galloon and some brigantines for that purpose. The Florentines, whose great hopes of reducing Pifa depended on its want of provisions, upon this, hired three light gallies of Federigo; and these sailing to Legbern, obliged Bardella to keep to sea. Notwithstanding this, he still found means to supply the Pisans with provisions. The Florentines, on the other hand, omitted no expence for obtaining their darling end of retaking Pifa, and deftroyed the harvest all tound

Ä. D. 1504.

Pila defenaed against the Florentines, tound that city with the most unrelenting sury. They, at the same time, entered upon a most expensive undertakings that of diverting the course of the Arno sive miles from Pisas and carrying it by a new channel into the standing waters between that city and Leghorn. But this project, after vast sums of money had been expended upon it, proved impractitable, because the bed of the lake, into which the waters were to be discharged, was higher than the channel of the Arno.

This was not the only misfortune that befel the Floren-cubo are tines this year. They had ordered the gallies they had hired, unsuccessto feize upon a ship laden for the Pifans with corn at Villa-ful. franca; but on their return they were wrecked off Repalle, and it was with difficulty the men were faved. The Florentines, being thus disappointed in all their attempts to recover Pifa by force, resolved to try what they could do by acts of humanity. A law passed in Florence, that every Pisan who should, in a certain time, live in his own house, and upon his own estate in that territory, should be forgiven all offences against the state. This expedient turned out to the disadvantage of the Florentines, because it relieved Pisa from a great many uscless months, which had chiefly oceasioned the scarcity of provsions in that city. The extreme poverty of the Pilans, however, was such, that their allies, especially the Lucquese and Petrucci of Sienna, tired of supporting them longer, persuaded them to offer the sovereignty of their city to the Genoese, and proposed to contribute rowards the defence of it for three years. A great party in Genoa was against accepting this proposal; but a majority was for it, and application was made to the French king for leave to embrace it, Genoa being at that time in his subjection. But notwithstanding all the plausible arguments urged in favour of the proposal, Lewis expressly commanded the Genoese to seject the offer, but without enjoining them not to affift the Pifans.

THE death of Federizo king of Naples, and that of Isabella Alterations of Castile, the wife of Ferdinand king of Spain, created great in Italy. alterations in the system of power in Italy. There was, how-A. D. ever, a total cessation of war there in the beginning of the 1505. year 1505, excepting between the Pisans and Florentines, which continued still to be carried on with the greatest acrimony on both parts, but with various fortune. Luca Savello was then the Florentine, as Tarlatino was the Pisan, general. Savello, who had his head-quarters at Cascina, thought himself superior to the Pisans in strength; and, in order to bring his enemies to an engagement, he marched across the

Serchip.

the Lucquese. Returning slowly that he might encourage the Pilans to attack him, Tarlatino lest Pila with a small party; and ordering the rest to follow him, he attacked the advanced guards of the Florentines at S. Jacopo; but they retired to the bridge of Cappelleso on the Osole, where all their army was assembled within a few miles of Pisa. Tarlatine, advancing inadvertently, found he could not retreat without being cut off with his whole party. The ground, however, was favourable to him, it being so narrow that the Florentines could not avail themselves of their superior numbers, which, on account of the booty they had with them, incommoded them. Tarlatino, expecting every moment the arrival of the army from Pifa, attacked the bridge where the flower of the Flarentine army was posted, with so much intrepidity, that, after being three times repulsed, he carried it; and the advanced parties from Pifa fording the river at the fame time, the Flarentines were pent up in a narrow spot of ground, where they fell into confusion, and behaved in so cowardly a manner, that they were entirely defeated, many of them being killed, but more of them made prisoners, disarmed, and plundered by the pealants in the country. This defeat was attended with the worst of consequences to the Florentines. The Pifans, without opposition, ravaged their country; and their general, Gian Pagolo Baglione, at Petrucci's instigation, refused to continue in their service, on pretence that his enemies in Perugia, to which city he had been restored by the interest of the Florentines, were becoming too powerful. To avoid, however, as much as he could, the charge of ingratitude, he promised never to carry arms against the Florentimes, and left his fon Malatesta, a ftripling, with fifteen men & arms, in their service. His professions, however, were infincere; for he, Bartolomeo Alviano, and Petrucci, were at that time negotiating with the cardinal de Medici, about restoring his family to its power in Florence. The Florentines were then very unable to keep the field, so greatly were they dispirited and weakened by their late deseat; so that it was thought, if a revolution could be effected in favour of the Medici tamily, they would have broken off all their connections with the French, and have reinstated that of Sforze in the government of Milan, where the French had now but a very small force. But cardinal Ascanio Sforza, who was the life of that project, dying in the mean time, it came to nothing. The other parties, however, who were in the interest of the Medici family, met at Piegai, a castle between the borders of Perugia and Sienna; where it was resolved, amonest amongst themselves, that Alviano, who had in disgust left the Spanish service, should enter Pisa, and from thence harrass the Florentines as he should see occasion.

The Florentines defeated,

THE Florentines were now reduced to a most deplorable and are fituation; and not knowing how to oppose a general of such reduced to power and experience as Alviano, they once more applied for great difthe affistance of the French king. But Lewis, who was now ficulties; grown old and covetous, absolutely resused to grant them any. unless they paid him thirty thousand ducats in ready money, which they pleaded they were unable to do, on account of the vast expences they had incurred by the Pisan war, and the confederacy that had been formed against them. Gonsalvo the Spanish general had his reasons for patronizing the Fiorentimes on this occasion. He interdicted Alviano, who had great effaces in Naples, from affilling the enemies of Florence, and charged him to refume his command in the Spanish army. At the same time he signified to the Pisans, and to the lord of Piembino, that they could not confishently with their connections with Spain, which had them lately under her protection, receive Alviano into their pay. He even went so far, as to offer to the Florentines the service of his infantry which was at Piombino, under their general Marco Antonio but are fa-Colonna: he likewise admonished all the other petty Italian voured by tyrants, as they were called, not to give the least affetance the Spa. to Akviano against the Florentines. Notwithstanding all this, nish gene-Alviano, with about one thousand men, attempted to make ral. his way to Pifa; but when he came to Scarling, a town under the jurisdiction of Piombino, he was overtaken by a mes-Lenger from Gonjalvo, who defired him not to proceed. His answer was full of spirit, that he was a free man, and not to be controuled in his conduct. He then marched to Campigdia, a town in the Florentine dominions, where some hostilities passed between him and the Florentines, whose headquarters were at Bibienna. From thence he marched to Corbut he found his difficulties encrease every day. The lord of Piembine, the Vitelli, and the other potentates he had confided in, relaxed in their endeavours to support him. Even Petrucci grew cold in his interest; nor was he quite sure whether the Pisans would incur Gonsalvo's resentment, by recewing him as their general. Under this uncertainty he retired to Vignole, in the territory of Piombino, under pretext of negotiating with Gonfalvo.

But so determined was the hatred of the Pisans towards Alviano the Florentines, that they now confented to receive him into difeated. their city; and on the fifteenth of August he made dispositions For fighting the Florentine army, which retired under the walls Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

of Campiglia, and prepared to intercept and fight Alviano is his march to Pifa, under their general Ercole Bentivoglio. The latter receiving reinforcements, Alviano could not proceed in his march without danger of being defeated, and Ercole came up with his rear at St. Vicenza, where, notwithstanding all the efforts of Alviano, Ercole got the victory by means of his artillery, fo that Alviano, with difficulty, escaped into the Siennese. Above one thousand of his horse were taken, and so confident had he been of success, that he became now the ridicule of all Italy.

Operations rentines against Pifa.

BENTIVOGLIO and Antonio Giacomini pressed the of the Flo- Florentine magistracy to pursue this signal success, by besieging Pifa, which they had great hopes of taking. But the council of ten in Florence, upon confulting their countrymen, found them entirely discouraged by their former bad successes from undertaking the fiege, and determined to subdue the Pisans by famine, and carrying the war on in their open country, till they should be obliged to submit. This resolution was strengthened by their considering the advanced feason of the year, and their being doubtful whether the government of Spain and Gonfalvo would approve of their undertaking. Gonfalvo continued still obstinate to oppose it, and threatened that if it was attempted, he would order the Spanish troops that were in Piombino to defend Pisa. rentines, therefore, resolved to turn their arms against Pandolfo Petrucci of Sienna, who had been the main ipring of all their misfortunes for some years past. They were in hopes that they would easily over-run the open territory of Sienna, and even occasion an insurrection against Petrucci in that city, which might make them masters either of that or some place that would prove an equivalent for the loss of Monte Pulciano, and strike Petrucci himself with dread. They were even so sanguine as to hope that, after reducing the Siemele, they might be able to conquer Lucca.

Divisions in Florence.

THE common people of Florence reasoned in a very disferent manner from their magistrates; and their gonfalonicate Soderini was of their opinion. They thought, that as their republic had formerly taken Pifa by fiege, they might do the fame, and that fuch an event would put an end to an expenfive difgraceful war. Soderini called an unufual meeting of the citizens on this occasion, and they were unanimous in their opinion, that the fiege of Pifa should be instantly undertaken, whatever opposition it might meet with from Gonfalvo, or the Italian powers.

Pisa besicged.

On the fixth of September the Florentines formed the siege with fix hundred men at arms, feven thousand foot, and fixteen pieces of battering cannon, besides other artillery, which were planted to great advantage, and played most furiously, upon the city; but the courage of the Pisans repaired the breaches faster than their enemy's artillery could open them. Ercole the Florentine general wanted to storm the place; but his men, being raw and new-raifed, through mere cowardice refused the service. Some authors say, that they made two ineffectual attempts; but that they were repulsed in both, and that their general in vain endeavoured to lead them up a third time. In short, the Florentines now lost the reputation they had acquired by defeating Alviano; and, regardless of all discipline, they broke up the siege on hearing that Gonfalvo had reinforced the garrison with fix hundred Spanish foot from Piombino. Next day the Florentines ingloriously retired to Cascina; and a few days after fifteen hundred more Spanish foot entered Pisa; but a peace being now concluded between France and Spain, they went from thence to Spain by fea.

THE affairs of the Florentines during 1506, though a bufy year with the other Italian potentates, is little worth men- 1506. tioning. They affisted pope Julius II. in making himself master of Bologna; but the Pisan war now entirely languished. Petrucci had tormed a confederacy with the Genoese and the Lucquese, for the desence of that city, which totally discouraged the Florentines, even from any attempts upon the Pilan territory. Soon after the Genoese shook off the voke of the French, and the Pisans found themselves in so good a condition, that they were able to fend their general Tarlatino to their affistance with some troops; but they were soon reduced to their former subjection. This forwardness of the Pisans to affist the Genocle, disobliged the French king so greatly, that he promised to affish the Florentines to recover Pifa. Ferdinand king of Spain altered this resolution of Lewis, by promising to dispose the Pisans to return under the government of the Florentines, who offered him one hundred and twenty thousand ducats in case he succeeded, and to enter into a confederacy with him. But Ferdinand undertook more Obstinucy than he could perform; for though the Pisans offered to of the Pisubmit to him, he could not prevail on them to re-assume fans, the Florentine voke. To secure, however, the money that was stipulated, he plainly told the Florentines that if they offered, by the affiftance of the French king, or by any other means, to render thenselves masters of Pisa, he would oppose them by force. He found reason to alter his conduct, and made a compromise with the French king at Savona, by which both of them were to contribute their endeavours for recover-

A. D. 1507.

A. D.

wbo de-

Spond.

ing Pisa to the Florentines, and to share the money. The ardour of the Pisans against the Florentines was now greatly The Pisans in the open country were more numerous than the citizens and the garrison, and perceiving that it was always in the power of the Florentines to destroy their harvest, and ruin their properties, they were for listening to an accommodation. The citizens, on the other hand, resolved to bury themselves in the ruins of their houses, rather than become again subject to the Florentines; but their prospect was now changed much for the worfe. The Genoese durst no longer affish them, being themselves subject to France. The Lucquese, who had generously aided them far beyond their ability, could do it no longer; and Petrucci refused to incur either expence or danger on their account. In the year 1508, Italy obtained some respite from the wars that had been carried on by the French, Germans, and Venetians. The French king imagined, from the conduct of the Florentines, that they favoured the emperor. He fent to Florence an ambassador, Michele Riccio, to complain of this partiality, and of their having refused to affist him against his enemies; but offering to overlook all that was past, provided they would promise not to molest the Pisans without his consent. The meaning of this message was, in fact, no other than to fecure to himself the whole of the money which, before his late rupture with Maximilian, he was to have divided with the late king of Spain. The Florentines took his message in that light. They pleaded the necessity they were under not to disoblige Maximilian; they put the king in mind of his engagements with regard to Pifa, and seemed to be surprised that he should so warmly interest himself for a people who had affished the Genoese against him; and at the same time

Conduct of Ferdinand.

of Pila.

FERDINAND; the most politic prince of his age, had intelligence of Riccio's negociation, and sent an ambassador to animate the Pisans against the Florentines. In short, the whole of the management of both kings was scandalous. Neither of them had the smallest regard for the Pisans; and all their dispute was, who should get the greatest sum from the Florentines. Thus the restitution of Pisa to the latter was delayed from the mercenary motives of two great monarchs.

they infifted upon the right they had to effect the reduction

Affairs of ltaly.

THE state of Florence, at this time, cannot be known but by representing that of Italy. Pope Julius II. was by birth a Genoese; and wanting to deliver his country from the yoke of the French, he made some overtures for that purpose to the Venetians. The latter was possessed of Rimini, Faenza, Ferrara, and several other states that had belonged to Borgia, all of which were claimed by the holy fee; and the pope, perceiving that the Venetians would not easily give them up, formed a confederacy against them, which consisted of almost all the powers in Europe, each of them, not excepting the Florentines, having pretentions on the Venetian territories. and their confederacy is known by the name of the League of Cambray. The Venetians were then in what may be called the zenith of their power; and the Turks, from whom they had most to dread, not being parties in the league against them, they resolved to brave all their enemies. Their riches, which were immense, contributed equally to their danger and their safety, because, while they maintained their armies, they rendered the confederacy against them more strong and compact. The pope began by ecclefiastical fulminations, which the Venetians despised. He then, once more, offered to be the friend of the Venetians, in which case the consederacy against them must dissolve of itself, if they would give him up Rimini and Faenza; but they rejected the proposal; so that, notwithstanding all their jarring interests, his holiness, the king of Spain, the French king, the emperor, and many other flates, took the field against that republic.

5

SUCH was the state of Italy in the beginning of the year 1509. The Florentines thought the opportunity favourable for their recovering Pisa. They had renewed their ravages Operations in that territory, and had taken into their pay the son of Bar-against della, of Porto Venere, with some vessels which blocked up Pisa. the Pilans by sea. This reduced them to such distress, that the Genoese and Lucquese, compassionating their misery, equipped a small squadron, and loaded it with provisions for their relief. The Florentines, on the other hand, reinforced their sleet with an English ship which they hired in the port of Legborn; and at the same time they lined all the banks of the Arno leading to Pifa, on both fides, with land forces and cannon. Those precautions defeated the generous intentions of the Genoese and Lucquese. The Florentines, to oblige the latter to a neutrality, fent a party from Cascina to plunder the port of Viareggio, which was then the magazine of the Lucpuese merchandizes. The dread of this brought on a negoziation on the part of the Lucquese, who agreed upon a defen-Eve league for three years, in which the Lucquese were exprefly excluded from the liberty of giving any manner of aflistance to the Pisans. This confederacy, if the Florentines should recover Pisa in the space of one year, was declared to be prolonged for other twelve years: and that, during this confederacy, the Florentines should not, without prejudice however to their rights, molest the Lucquese in the possession of Pietra Santa and Mutrone.

² Guicciardini, book viii.

A neutrality concluded.

Bur the necessities of the kings of France and Spain proved the best friends of the Florentines on this occasion. They wanted money, and the Florentines wisely declined to advance them any, or to enter into the league of Cambray, unless the two kings should withdraw all their affistance from the Pisans. It must be acknowledged that both potentates acted in a shameful manner, the one towards the Pilans, and the other towards the Florentines. His Catholic majesty had taken the Pisans under his protection; but offered to abandon them for a fum of money. The French king, on the other hand, had again and again promised to affist the Florentines in the recovery of Pila; but was so far from performing his engagements, that he fent a body of troops to defend the Pilans, lest they should be obliged to surrender without his receiving the money. After various difficulties had been started and conquered, a treaty was at last concluded on. The terms were, that neither of the monarchs, or their confederates, were directly or indirectly to affift the Pisans: that the Florentines b, in case they should recover Pisa within the year next ensuing, should pay, at certain times, to each of the two kings fifty thousand ducats; and, in that case, a league was declared to sublist between the parties for three years, to commence from the day of the recovery, by which the Flarentines should be obliged to furnish three hundred men at arms, for the defence of the states of the two kings in Italy; and, on the other hand, each of those monarchs, on demand, should supply them with at least three hundred men at arms, for their own defence.

tians.

Diffress of Besides those stipulations, the avarice of Lewis obliged the Vene- the Fibrentines to agree to a fecret article for paying him fifty thousand ducats more; and the cardinal of Rouen was likewife to have the disposal of twenty-five thousand for negociating the agreement. Those points being adjusted, the parties in the league of Cambray prepared to attack the Venetians, who finding all their endeavours in vain to prevent the storm from falling on them, made dispositions for defending themselves. The history of that war which stripped the Venetians of almost all their acquisitions in Europe, is foreign to this work; It is sufficient to say, that the league of Cambray was of the greatest

b Guicciard, book viii,

greatest service to the Florentines, by diverting the attention of all the Italian states from Pisa, where they still found great difficulties to surmount. The Lucquese took every occation of breaking, or at least evading, their lately concluded neutrality; and the citizens of Pisa, the youthful part of them especially, continued obstinate against the Florentines, while the situation of their city was such, as rendered it next to impossible for their enemies to exclude all provisions from entering it.

NOTWITHSTANDING those difficulties, the supplies sent to Pifa presthe Pifans were in no degree proportioned to their necessities; fed by the and their garrison shewed such reluctance towards continuing Florenthe defence of the city, that the inhabitants were obliged tines. to propose an accommodation under the mediation of the lord of Piombino. The Florentines accepted of this proposal, and the famous Nicholas Machiavel, who was then their fecretary, was appointed to be their plenipotentiary at Piombino. This negotiation, however, was far from relaxing the operations of the Florentines against Pifa. They divided their army into three parts, by which they blocked up that citv more effectually than ever. This obliged the Pisans to have recourse to a stratagem. One of them, Alfonso del Mutolo, a young man, having been taken prisoner by the Florentines, had received many civilities from his captors, and was therefore thought a proper hand for deceiving them. He fecretly proposed, that one of the Florentine divisions that lay at & Jacopo, should advance by night to one of the gates of Pifa, which he was to put into their hands. The true intention of the Pisans, had their design succeeded, was to have admitted into their city as many of the Florentines as they shought proper, and, after putting them to the fword, to have marched out and attacked another division of their army. But the caution of the Florentines rendered the plot abortive: instead of marching tumultuously as the Pisans expected, their stoops approached the gate with circumspection and regula-Tity; so that when the Pisans came to execute the delign, they could kill but very few of the Florentines, who immediately retreated to their station.

THE distresses of the Pisans encreased through this disap-A negociapointment. Multitudes of them perished in their streets for tion is set want of food. The misery of such spectacles seemed to en-on foot.

crease the abhorrence of the Pisan magistrates for the Florenines. They endeavoured to send out of their city all useless mouths, but they were put to death, or driven back by the Florentines. They then pretended that Maximilian was on his march to succour them, and that the treaty of Piombine

Dd4

pecting that Maximilian would have relieved them. He had been excluded from the negociation between the kings of France and Spain; and the acquisition of Pifa would have been of vast service to his affairs. His poverty, however, and inability, prevented him from making his advantage of the juncture; and the Pisan peasants, seeing all their hopes of relief at an end, ran to arms, and obliged their magistrates, in good earnest, to enter into a fresh negociation with the Floren-Alamanno Salviati, one of the Florentine commissaies, negotiated this treaty, which notwithstanding all the opposition made to it from the Pilan magistrates, was at last concluded, and was highly to the advantage of the Pifans. They not only received a full remission of all their offences against the Florentines, but obtained many concessions and privileges, which they had not before, and the Florentines gave up all their claims of restitution of their goods, which the Pilans had feized in the beginning of the war. the war between the Florentines and the Pifans ended not without great honour to the Florentines, on account of their wisdom in concluding the treaty, but more so because of the good faith with which they observed its articles.

ed to the Florentines,

Pila reftor-

who nego-Maximilian.

THE emperor Maximilian, however, was now with his ciate with army in the bowels of Italy, and pretending to be intitled to all the rights of the Roman emperors there, he renewed his claims upon Florence, as being a fief of the empire, and objected to the Pisans returning under its dominion. The French king, apprehensive of losing the residue of the money stipulated to be paid him by the Florentines, eatnestly pressed them to an accommodation with Maximilian; and they accordingly fent deputies to him while he was at Verma, amongst whom was Peter Guicciardini, father of the historian, at that time, one of the first men of the Florentine republic. As Maximilian was continually in want of money, a treaty was foon concluded, by which they a obtained of him, in most ample form and manner, the privileges of a confirmation of the liberties as well of the city of Florence, as of the dominion and jurisdiction of the towns and states in their possession, with release from all debts due in times past. But all this was on condition that the Florentine depunes should engage, in the name of their republic, to pay Maximilian forty thousand ducats.

Scheme of the pope.

By this time, the contracting parties in the league of Cambray had split amongst themselves; and pope Julius II. took advantage of their disunion to pursue his first scheme, that of driving the French out of Italy. This brought on various negociations foreign to our subject. The Florentines continued to be strictly attached to France. The emperor and the French king, in a short time, became as jealous of his holiness as they had been before of the Venetians, and they renewed their convention upon the principles of the league of Cambray. The more to intimidate the pope, the king convened an affembly of bishops at Tours, where it was decreed, that it was lawful to make war with the pope as a temporal prince, and that no more money should be sent to The Florentines had the courage to continue in the French interest, and even lent the king two hundred men at arms, to protect his duchy of Milan, in consequence of their convention with him; but he made this demand not fo much because he really wanted such an affistance, but that he might widen the breach between the pope and the Florentimes. Peter Soderini remained still gonfalonier, and was thought to be the great prop of the French interest in Florence; for which reason he was affassinated, as is said, with the privity of the pope, and at the direction of the cardinal de Medici. After this, the pope did all he could to court the Florentines into his alliance; but far from succeeding, they gave the Siennese warning that they were resolved to break the truce with them, because they were in the pope's interest, and enemies to the French king.

[🔭] Guicciardini, book viii.

CEDSIA

His holiness, on the other hand, acted a vigorous part, Divisions both in politics and in war. By an ill-timed frugality of the in Italy. French king, the Swiss, who had served them so effectually in the affair of Sforza, abandoned his alliance upon his refusing to augment their pay. The Venetians had joined with the holy see, and had, by this time, recovered great part of their territory. Ferdinand the Catholic, as he is called, king of Spain, had abandoned the league of Cambray, for the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, which he had obtained from the pope, and was a firm friend to the holy see; and even the king of England, young Henry VIII. the richest and most powerful prince then in Europe, took part with his holiness. The conduct of Lewis at this juncture, was certainly impolitic. Tho' the emperor Maximilian was his ally, yet the whole burden and expence of the war lay on France. Lewis was obliged to give the emperor an hundred thoufand crowns before he could put his troops in motion, and he gave him fix thousand more for the useles investiture of Milan. In short, this successor of the Roman Casars, as Maximilian defigned himself, served in the capacity of a mercenary officer, and took pay from every power that was able to give it him. Lewis, encouraged by his alliance with the Florentines, undertook the desence of the duchy of Ferrara, which the pope said belonged to the holy see; and he was so impolitic, if not unjust, as to promise to put Maximilian in possession of Rome, and the ecclesiastical state, and of all Italy, except Milan and Genoa, the dominions of the Florentines, and the Ferrarcse.

Fenality of Maximi-Jian.

MAXIMILIAN, who lett his titles as well as troops out for hire, on his part, gave Lewis the sanction of his name, for convening a general council that was to humble the pope's spiritual authority, at the same time that his temporal was to be annihilated. In this they were encouraged by the promiles of many disobliged cardinals and clergy, to serve them in the council. It foon appeared that Lewis had missaken his measures: while he was asking the opinions of the clergy, and stating cases of conscience upon the legality of his undertakings, the pope was raising armies and hiring folders. About the end of September, 1510, he entered the Ferrarese, at the head of an army which had laid waste all the open country, while the flee: of his allies, the Venetians, ravaged the sea coasts, and blocked up the mouths of the Po. The Venetians, and the court of Naples, at the same time promised to affift him with land troops. The French had then an army in or near the city of Ferrara; but his holiness did not think proper, not yet being joined by the Venetians and Neapolitans, to attack that city. Political confiderations, on the one hand, retarded their junction with him, and on the other, the animolities that prevailed amongst the French generals, and the poverty of Maximilian, which made his German troops mutiny, were favourable to pope Julius, whose conduct on this occasion was wonderful.

Spirited conduct of the pape.

Tho' he was now past seventy, and had many bodily infirmities, besides that of age, upon him, and though his allies had disappointed him, he undauntedly pursued his scheme of subduing Ferrara, as he had done Modena some time besore. His general was the duke of Urbino, but his troops were raw, ill-armed, ill paid, and not so numerous as the French under the duke of Ferrara, who retook the Polesine of Roviga, Final, and other places; and, by the help of stat-bottomed vessels, he deseated the Venetian sleet, and prevented their army from joining that of the pope. All those unpromiting circumstances were so far from disconcerting his holiness, that they confirmed him in his darling purpose of driving all foreigners, or barbarians, as he called them, out of Italy, by his own arms only. By this time the French king had pro-proclaimed a general council to be held at Lions against the pope; and his and the imperial interest was so strong at Rome, that the cardinals of Santa Croce, Cosenza, Bayeux, St. Malo, and San Severino, abruptly left his holiness, and put themselves under the protection of the Florentines.

THE latter by this time began to stagger in their alliance The with the French, when they faw them difunited amongst them- Florenselves, and that Lewis had not, as he had promised, come in tines stage person to their affistance. They however received the dif-ger in their contented cardinals with great civility, and granted them the auith the protection of the senate, but without limiting it to any time, French. that they might be at liberty to withdraw it at their discretion. The pope infifted upon the cardinals, three of whom he threatened with excommunication, repairing to him at Bologna; and the Florentines durst not exasperate him. It was in vain for the cardinals to implore the farther protection of the fenate, who gave them warning to leave their territory, and they went by the Lunigiana to Milan.

CHAUMONT D'AMBOISE was the French general Distresses in the Ferrareje, where he and the duke of Ferrara continued of the pape. to gain great advantages; and by the advice of Bentivoglio, whom his holiness had driven out of Bologna, he of a sudden entered the Bolognese, and presented himself before that city, which was instantly filled with terror and consternation. The pope at this time certainly did not confider the Florentines as his onemies; for he fent the most precious of his jewels to the monastery of Murate, in Florence, to preserve them from the French. He bitterly upbraided the Venetian ambassadors with the inactivity of their army; and being every moment plied by all the foreign ambassadors at his court, and the best of his friends, to enter into a treaty with Chaumoni, he was so agitated between pride and necessity, that he fell into a flow tever, and at last solemnly consented to send Pico, count of Mirandola to treat with Chamount. That general was fecretly as much disposed as his holiness was towards an accommodation, and tent by the count the terms on which he was willing to conclude it. The pope thought them hard, and suffered the time to expire that was fixed for his answer, without returning any. Towards the evening his fever left him, upon his receiving intelligence that the Venetians and Spaniards were on their march to his relief. He then gave full scope to his indignation against the French, and threatened to excommunicate their whole nation, if they did not immediately withdraw all affiliance from the duke of Ferrara. This menace would have had little effect upon Chaumont, had not the English ambassador, then at Bologna, interposed, and plainly told the French generals, who were now within three miles of that city, that if they did advance farther, his mafter would confider it as a declaration of war between France and England. This was the true reason that had made Chaumont desirous of peace: he knew how unequal the match must then be between England and France; and that very night, upon the menace of the English ambassador, he broke up his camp and returned to Rubiera.

wiko re- Brieves Abem.

THE pope now raised his voice, and declared to the ambassadors, and those who made application to him on the head of peace, that he would liften to none till he was put in possession of the Ferrarese. To give weight to his words, though he was still in a languishing state of health, he applied himself to all the duties of a general officer, and he underwent more fatigue than any subaltern in his service. As to the Florentines, he altered his tone towards them likewife, and treated them with far less complaisance than he had done in his diffress. His army was commanded by Marc Antonio Colonna, who took Concordia by storm, and at the end of December belieged Mirandola. This fiege at first was carried on under great difficulties; and in the beginning of the year 1511, notwithstanding the bitterness of the season, his holiness, impatient at the slowness of the operations, left Bologna, and, attended by three cardinals, he went in person to his army before Mirandola, and took upon himself the command of it. He fixed his head quarters at a little church exposed to all the fire of the garrison, and he was all day long on horseback, or in the trenches, animating or punishing his men, and forwarding their operations. The garrison, which was commanded by Trivulzi, made a noble relistance; but the town was defended by the widow of Lodovico, count of Mirandola, who had been dead but about eight months, and of the house of Triulzi. The French king had given order to risque every thing for the relief of Mirandola; but Chaumont having a difference with the Trivulzi family, instead of fuccouring the belieged, retired to Milan, and a severe frost coming on, both the citadel and town were furrendered by capitulation to his holiness. This event sunk the credit of the French arms in Italy, and drew such reproaches from all quarters upon Chaumont, that he fell into a fever and died. A fecret treaty, all this while, was going on between the pope and the emperor. The latter found he was to have no more money from France, and that he might obtain a great deal from England, and therefore he resolved to detach himself from Lewis. He demanded, as the price of his new alliance with the pope, to be put into possession of Modena, which

he pope, who was afraid it would be taken by the French. agreed to, that he might have the more leifure to profecute nis war in the Ferrarese. But the French had now sent Progress of fresh troops into Italy, under the command of the famous the French Gaston de Foix, the Trivulzes, and other able generals, who, in Italy. for fome time, carried every thing before them like a torrent. Their fuccess produced a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, and the ambassadors of both strongly sollicited the pope to relax in the affair of Ferrara; but his holiness refused to give them the hearing if they even mentioned it; upon which the bishop of Goritz abruptly left his court. Four days after his departure, the pope perceiving his danger from the conquests of the French in Italy, which encreased every day, employed the bishop of Murray, who was ambassador from James IV. of Scotland, to treat with the French generals about an accommodation; but this was so far from being effected, that the French obliged his holiness himself to abandon Bologna, and, after driving the ecclefiastic and Venetian armies out of that city, they took and demolished the citadel. This, together with fome untowardly accidents which happened about the same time, greatly mortified his holiness, who was obliged to return to Rome; and now saw himself in danger of losing both his conquests and reputation. His diffres was increased upon hearing that a general council had been indicted, and that he himself was summoned to appear before it. The bishop of Murray continued still to act as mediator between all parties; and the bishop of Goritz had A negociareturned by him a plan of an accommodation, upon the foot-tion. ing b that had been proposed by the pope himself; but the bishop of Murray's endeavours were ineffectual. When he returned to the pope, he found him so much embarrassed, that he could bring Goritz no fatisfactory answer. Upon this Maximilian and Lewis resolved immediately to assemble the general council.

THE Florentines were at this juncture neither feared, trust-The couned, nor hated, by any power; but, by means of their neu-cil of Pifa trality, they had repaired their finances. They had no reason proposed. to be pleased with the pope, and vast difficulties occurred about the place where the council was to be held. The French king named Pifa, because it was subject to the Florentines; a people whom, he said, he could trust. This was a tender point for the Florentines. They durst not, on the one hand, disoblige his most Christian majesty; and, on the other, they were under some difficulties as to the legality of any council

d Guicciardini, book ix.

plainly told the French generals, who were now within three miles of that city, that if they did advance farther, his mafter would confider it as a declaration of war between France and England. This was the true reason that had made Chaumont desirous of peace: he knew how unequal the match must then be between England and France; and that very night, upon the menace of the English ambassador, he broke up his camp and returned to Rubiera.

wiko retrieves them.

THE pope now raised his voice, and declared to the ambassadors, and those who made application to him on the head of peace, that he would liften to none till he was put in possession of the Ferrarese. To give weight to his words, though he was still in a languishing state of health, he applied himself to all the duties of a general officer, and he underwent more fatigue than any subaltern in his fervice. As to the Florentines, he altered his tone towards them likewife, and treated them with far less complaisance than he had done in his diffress. His army was commanded by Marc Antonio Colonna, who took Concordia by storm, and at the end of December belieged Mirandola. This fiege at first was carried on under great difficulties; and in the beginning of the year 1511, notwithstanding the bitterness of the season, his holiness, impatient at the slowness of the operations, lest Bologna, and, attended by three cardinals, he went in person to his army before Mirandola, and took upon himself the command of it. He fixed his head-quarters at a little church exposed to all the fire of the garrison, and he was all day long on horseback, or in the trenches, animating or punishing his men, and forwarding their operations. The garrison, which was commanded by Trivulzi, made a noble relistance; but the town was defended by the widow of Lodovico, count of Mirandola, who had been dead but about eight months, and of the house of Triulzi. The French king had given order to risque every thing for the relief of Mirandola; but Chaumont having a difference with the Trivulzi family, instead of fuccouring the belieged, retired to Milan, and a fevere frost coming on, both the citadel and town were furrendered by capitulation to his holiness. This event sunk the credit of the French arms in Italy, and drew such reproaches from all quarters upon Chaumont, that he fell into a fever and died. A fecret treaty, all this while, was going on between the pope and the emperor. The latter found he was to have no more money from France, and that he might obtain a great deal from England, and therefore he resolved to detach himself from Lewis. He demanded, as the price of his new alliance with the pope, to be put into pessession of Modena, which

the pope, who was afraid it would be taken by the French, agreed to, that he might have the more leifure to profecute his war in the Ferrarese. But the French had now sent Progress of. fresh troops into Italy, under the command of the famous the French Gaston de Foix, the Trivulzes, and other able generals, who, in Italy. for fome time, carried every thing before them like a torrent. Their fuccess produced a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, and the ambassadors of both strongly sollicited the pope to relax in the affair of Ferrara; but his holiness refused to give them the hearing if they even mentioned it; upon which the bishop of Goritz abruptly left his court. Four days after his departure, the pope perceiving his danger from the conquests of the French in Italy, which encreased every day, employed the bishop of Murray, who was ambassador from James IV. of Scotland, to treat with the French generals about an accommodation; but this was so far from being effected, that the French obliged his holiness himself to abandon Bologna, and, after driving the ecclesiastic and Venetian armies out of that city, they took and demolished the citadel. This, together with some untowardly accidents which happened about the same time, greatly mortified his holiness, who was obliged to return to Rome; and now faw himself in danger of losing both his conquests and reputation. His diftress was increased upon hearing that a general council had been indicted, and that he himself was summoned to appear before it. The bishop of Murray continued still to act as mediator between all parties; and the bishop of Goritz had A negociareturned by him a plan of an accommodation, upon the foot-tion. ing b that had been proposed by the pope himself; but the bishop of Murray's endeavours were ineffectual. When he returned to the pope, he found him so much embarrassed, that he could bring Goritz no fatisfactory answer. Upon this Maximilian and Lewis resolved immediately to assemble the general council.

The Florentines were at this juncture neither feared, trust-The council, nor hated, by any power; but, by means of their neu-cil of Pissa trality, they had repaired their finances. They had no reason proposed. to be pleased with the pope, and vast difficulties occurred about the place where the council was to be held. The French king named Pisa, because it was subject to the Florentines; a people whom, he said, he could trust. This was a tender point for the Florentines. They durst not, on the one hand, disoblige his most Christian majesty; and, on the other, they were under some difficulties as to the legality of any council

d Guicciardini, book ix.

plainly told the French generals, who were now within three miles of that city, that if they did advance farther, his mafter would confider it as a declaration of war between France and England. This was the true reason that had made Chaumont desirous of peace: he knew how unequal the match must then be between England and France; and that very night, upon the menace of the English ambassador, he broke up his camp and returned to Rubiera.

who retrieves them.

THE pope now raised his voice, and declared to the ambassadors, and those who made application to him on the head of peace, that he would liften to none till he was put in possession of the Ferrarese. To give weight to his words, though he was still in a languishing state of health, he applied himself to all the duties of a general officer, and he underwent more fatigue than any subaltern in his service. As to the Florentines, he altered his tone towards them likewife, and treated them with far less complaisance than he had His army was commanded by Marc Andone in his distress. tonio Celonna, who took Concordia by storm, and at the end of December besieged Mirandola. This siege at first was carried on under great difficulties; and in the beginning of the year 1511, notwithstanding the bitterness of the season, his holiness, impatient at the slowness of the operations, left Bologna, and, attended by three cardinals, he went in person to his army before Mirandola, and took upon himself the command of it. He fixed his head-quarters at a little church exposed to all the fire of the garrison, and he was all day long on horseback, or in the trenches, animating or punishing his men, and forwarding their operations. The garrison, which was commanded by Trivulzi, made a noble relistance; but the town was defended by the widow of Lodovico, count of Mirandola, who had been dead but about eight months, and of the house of Triulzi. The French king had given orders to risque every thing for the relief of Mirandola; but Chaumont having a difference with the Trivulzi family, instead of fuccouring the belieged, retired to Milan, and a fevere froft coming on, both the citadel and town were furrendered by capitulation to his holiness. This event sunk the credit of the French arms in Italy, and drew such reproaches from all quarters upon Chaumont, that he fell into a fever and died. A fecret treaty, all this while, was going on between the pope and the emperor. The latter found he was to have no more money from France, and that he might obtain a great deal from England, and therefore he resolved to detach himself from Lewis. He demanded, as the price of his new alliance with the pope, to be put into pessession of Modena, which

he pope, who was afraid it would be taken by the French, agreed to, that he might have the more leifure to profecute nis war in the Ferrarese. But the French had now sent Progress of fresh troops into Italy, under the command of the famous the French Gaston de Foix, the Trivulzes, and other able generals, who, in Italy. for fome time, carried every thing before them like a torrent. Their fuccess produced a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, and the ambassadors of both strongly sollicited the pope to relax in the affair of Ferrara; but his holiness refused to give them the hearing if they even mentioned it; upon which the bishop of Goritz abruptly left his court. Four days after his departure, the pope perceiving his danger from the conquests of the French in Italy, which encreased every day, employed the bishop of Murray, who was ambassador from James IV. of Scotland, to treat with the French generals about an accommodation; but this was so far from being effected, that the French obliged his holiness himself to abandon Bologna, and, after driving the ecclesiastic and Venetian armies out of that city, they took and demolished the citadel. This, together with fome untowardly accidents which happened about the same time, greatly mortified his holiness, who was obliged to return to Rome; and now faw himself in danger of losing both his conquests and reputation. His diffress was increased upon hearing that a general council had been indicted, and that he himself was summoned to appear before it. The bishop of Murray continued still to act as mediator between all parties; and the bishop of Goritz had A negociareturned by him a plan of an accommodation, upon the foot-tion, ing b that had been proposed by the pope himself; but the bishop of Murray's endeavours were ineffectual. When he returned to the pope, he found him so much embarrassed, that he could bring Goritz no satisfactory answer. Upon this Maximilian and Lewis resolved immediately to assemble the general council.

The Florentines were at this juncture neither feared, trust-The council, nor hated, by any power; but, by means of their neu-cil of Pissa trality, they had repaired their finances. They had no reason proposed. to be pleased with the pope, and vast difficulties occurred about the place where the council was to be held. The French king named Pisa, because it was subject to the Florentines; a people whom, he said, he could trust. This was a tender point for the Florentines. They durst not, on the one hand, disoblige his most Christian majesty; and, on the other, they were under some difficulties as to the legality of any council that

d Guicciardini, book ix.

plainly told the French generals, who were now within three miles of that city, that if they did advance farther, his mafter would confider it as a declaration of war between France and England. This was the true reason that had made Chaumont desirous of peace; he knew how unequal the match must then be between England and France; and that very night, upon the menace of the English ambassador, he broke up his camp and returned to Rubiera.

who re- prieves pem.

THE pope now raised his voice, and declared to the ambassadors, and those who made application to him on the head of peace, that he would liften to none till he was put in possession of the Ferrarese. To give weight to his words, though he was still in a languishing state of health, he applied himself to all the duties of a general officer, and he underwent more fatigue than any subaltern in his service. As to the Florentines, he altered his tone towards them likewife, and treated them with far less complaisance than he had done in his distress. His army was commanded by Marc Antonio Colonna, who took Concordia by storm, and at the end of December belieged Mirandola. This siege at first was carried on under great difficulties; and in the beginning of the year 1511, notwithstanding the bitterness of the season, his holiness, impatient at the slowness of the operations, lest Bologna, and, attended by three cardinals, he went in person to his army before Mirandola, and took upon himself the command of it. He fixed his head-quarters at a little church exposed to all the fire of the garrison, and he was all day long on horseback, or in the trenches, animating or punishing his men, and forwarding their operations. The garrison, which was commanded by Trivulzi, made a noble relistance; but the town was defended by the widow of Lodovico, count of Mirandola, who had been dead but about eight months, and of the house of Triulzi. The French king had given orders to risque every thing for the relief of Mirandola; but Chaumont having a difference with the Trivulzi family, instead of fuccouring the belieged, retired to Milan, and a severe frost coming on, both the citadel and town were furrendered by capitulation to his holinefs. This event funk the credit of the French arms in Italy, and drew such reproaches from all quarters upon Chaumont, that he fell into a fever and died. A fecret treaty, all this while, was going on between the pope and the emperor. The latter found he was to have no more money from France, and that he might obtain a great deal from England, and therefore he resolved to detach himself from Lewis. He demanded, as the price of his new alliance with the pope, to be put into possession of Modena, which he pope, who was afraid it would be taken by the French, igreed to, that he might have the more leifure to profecute nis war in the Ferrarese. But the French had now sent Progress of resh troops into Italy, under the command of the famous the French Gaston de Foix, the Trivulzes, and other able generals, who, in Italy. for fome time, carried every thing before them like a torrent. Their fuccess produced a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, and the ambassadors of both strongly sollicited the pope to relax in the affair of Ferrara; but his holiness refused to give them the hearing if they even mentioned it; upon which the bishop of Goritz abruptly left his court. Four days after his departure, the pope perceiving his danger from the conquests of the French in Italy, which encreased every day, employed the bishop of Murray, who was ambassador from James IV. of Scotland, to treat with the French generals about an accommodation; but this was so far from being effected, that the French obliged his holiness himself to abandon Bologna, and, after driving the ecclefiastic and Venetian armies out of that city, they took and demolished the citadel. This, together with some untowardly accidents which happened about the same time, greatly mortified his holiness, who was obliged to return to Rome; and now saw himself in danger of losing both his conquests and reputation. His diftress was increased upon hearing that a general council had been indicted, and that he himself was summoned to appear before it. The bishop of Murray continued still to act as mediator between all parties; and the bishop of Goritz had A negociareturned by him a plan of an accommodation, upon the foot-tion. ing b that had been proposed by the pope himself; but the bishop of Murray's endeavours were ineffectual. When he returned to the pope, he found him so much embarrassed, that he could bring Goritz no satisfactory answer. Upon this Maximilian and Lewis resolved immediately to assemble the general council.

THE Florentines were at this juncture neither feared, trust-The council, nor hated, by any power; but, by means of their neu-cil of Pisa trality, they had repaired their finances. They had no reason proposed. to be pleased with the pope, and vast difficulties occurred about the place where the council was to be held. The French king named Pisa, because it was subject to the Florentines; a people whom, he said, he could trust. This was a tender point for the Florentines. They durst not, on the one hand, disoblige his most Christian majesty; and, on the other, they were under some difficulties as to the legality of any council

d Guicciandini, book ix.

plainly told the French generals, who were now within three miles of that city, that if they did advance farther, his mafter would confider it as a declaration of war between France and England. This was the true reason that had made Chaumont desirous of peace: he knew how unequal the match must then be between England and France; and that very night, upon the menace of the English ambassador, he broke up his camp and returned to Rubiera.

ruko regrieves gbem.

THE pope now raised his voice, and declared to the ambassadors, and those who made application to him on the head of peace, that he would liften to none till he was put in possession of the Ferrarese. To give weight to his words, though he was still in a languishing state of health, he applied himself to all the duties of a general officer, and he underwent more fatigue than any subaltern in his service. As to the Florentines, he altered his tone towards them likewife, and treated them with far less complaisance than he had done in his diffress. His army was commanded by Marc Antonio Colonna, who took Concordia by storm, and at the end of December belieged Mirandola. This fiege at first was carried on under great difficulties; and in the beginning of the year 1511, notwithstanding the bitterness of the season, his holiness, impatient at the slowness of the operations, lest Bologna, and, attended by three cardinals, he went in person to his army before Mirandola, and took upon himself the command of it. He fixed his head quarters at a little church exposed to all the fire of the garrison, and he was all day long on horseback, or in the trenches, animating or punishing his men, and forwarding their operations. The garrison, which was commanded by Trivulzi, made a noble relistance; but the town was defended by the widow of Lodovico, count of Mirandola, who had been dead but about eight months, and of the house of Triulzi. The French king had given orders to risque every thing for the relief of Mirandola; but Chaumont having a difference with the Trivulzi family, instead of fuccouring the belieged, retired to Milan, and a severe frost coming on, both the citadel and town were furrendered by capitulation to his holinefs. This event funk the credit of the French arms in Italy, and drew such reproaches from all quarters upon Chaumont, that he fell into a fever and died. A fecret treaty, all this while, was going on between the pope and the emperor. The latter found he was to have no more money from France, and that he might obtain a great deal from England, and therefore he resolved to detach himself from Lewis. He demanded, as the price of his new alliance with the pope, to be put into pessession of Modena, which

the pope, who was afraid it would be taken by the French. agreed to, that he might have the more leifure to profecute his war in the Ferrarese. But the French had now sent Progress of fresh troops into Italy, under the command of the famous the French Gaston de Foix, the Trivulzes, and other able generals, who, in Italy. for fome time, carried every thing before them like a torrent. Their fuccess produced a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, and the ambassadors of both strongly sollicited the pope to relax in the affair of Ferrara; but his holiness refused to give them the hearing if they even mentioned it: upon which the bishop of Goritz abruptly left his court. Four days after his departure, the pope perceiving his danger from the conquests of the French in Italy, which encreased every day, employed the bishop of Murray, who was ambassador from James IV. of Scotland, to treat with the French generals about an accommodation; but this was so far from being effected, that the French obliged his holiness himself to abandon Bologna, and, after driving the ecclesiastic and Venetian armies out of that city, they took and demolished the citadel. This, together with some untowardly accidents which happened about the same time, greatly mortified his holiness, who was obliged to return to Rome; and now faw himself in danger of losing both his conquests and reputation. His diffress was increased upon hearing that a general council had been indicted, and that he himself was summoned to appear before it. The bishop of Murray continued still to act as mediator between all parties; and the bishop of Goritz had A negociareturned by him a plan of an accommodation, upon the foot-tion. ing b that had been proposed by the pope himself; but the bilhop of Murray's endeavours were ineffectual. When he returned to the pope, he found him so much embarrassed, that he could bring Goritz no satisfactory answer. Upon this Maximilian and Lewis resolved immediately to assemble the general council.

The Florentines were at this juncture neither feared, trust-The council, nor hated, by any power; but, by means of their neu-cil of Pisa trality, they had repaired their finances. They had no reason proposed. to be pleased with the pope, and vast difficulties occurred about the place where the council was to be held. The French king named Pisa, because it was subject to the Florentines; a people whom, he said, he could trust. This was a tender point for the Florentines. They durst not, on the one hand, disoblige his most Christian majesty; and, on the other, they were under some difficulties as to the legality of any council

d Guicciandini, book ix.

that was held without the pope's consent, and against his will. The question was proposed in a council of one hundred and fifty citizens, where the matter was debated, and the French king's request agreed to; but with so much caution and secrecy, that neither the pope nor the cardinals knew of their resolution.

Inconftancy
of the French
Ling.

AFTER the French had taken Bologna, it was plain, that, had they pleased, they might have made themselves masters of Rome and the Ecclesiastical State. The pope had now no dependence but upon the mediation of the king of Scotland, and the dread which the French king was under from England. Every one knows the vanity and ambition of Henry VIII. who at this time merited the epithet which he and his fuccessors have ever after used, that " of Desender of the Faith," or, more properly, the papal power, by renewing his instances with the French king not to pursue his conquests in Italy. Perhaps Lewis, at the same time, had some religious panics on his mind; but, be that as it will, it is certain that all Europe was amazed at the sudden turn of his sentiments in favour of the pope. He prohibited all rejoicings for taking Bologna, and the other rapid successes of his army. He exhorted Bentivoglio, whom he had restored to the government of Bologna; to behave dutifully towards his holiness; and he even offered to ask pardon, if he had offended the head of the church. Those submissions, instead of mollifying the pope, served but to revive his haughtiness and stubbornness. Lewis had gone so far as to draw his army off towards Tuscany and the Milanele; and had declared to the Scotch ambassador, that there was scarce any thing he would not do, that he might be reconciled to the holy father. The pope took him at his word; and, amongst other very hard terms required of the duke of Ferrara, he demanded that he should deliver up all the towns he held in the Romagna. Lewis agreed to all; but his compliance ferved only to make his holiness rise in his demands, till the patience of Lewis was worn out; so that he declared Bentivoglio and the Bolognese to be under his own protection, and fent a strong body of troops to their defence. The irresolution of Lewis, with the poverty and ambition of Maximilian, and the reduced power of the Venetians, again disconcerted the affairs of Italy; fo that there was not a potentate there who could trust another; but the pope was the only gainer. Despising the small number of cardinals who had fet their names to the indiction of the general council at Pifa, he indicted another at the city of Rome, which was to fit the first of May, 1512. But though, as we have seen, he was perpetually rifing in his demands, he still employed the Scotch ambassador in the negociation he had begun with Lewis; and at the same time he endeavoured to strengthen himself by an alliance with the Venetians and Spaniards; but, above all, he fought to recover the friendship of the Florentines.

Being conscious of the causes of offence he had given The Flothem, he was afraid they might call in the French to their rentines affistance against the Siennese, for the recovery of Monte Pul-recover ciano, which lay near the frontier of the ecclefiaftical state. Monte Instead therefore of garrisoning that place, both he and Pe-Pulciano. trucci, who was under the same apprehensions, but was obliged to proceed with more caution, joined in a negociation for forming a defensive league between the Florentines and the Siennese, and for restoring Monte Pulciano to the former. At last, after conquering many difficulties, Simonetta, who acted on this occasion as agent from the pope, succeeded in bringing about a league for twenty-five years between the two states: upon which Monte Pulciano, being previously confirmed in all its ancient privileges, returned to the subjection of the Florentines. This accommodation was of great service to the The Venetians, this summer, had defeated the French and Germans, and recovered great part of their territory. Lewis ascribed their success to the poverty and backwardness of Maximilian; and the latter first grew cold in the affair of the council of Pisa, and afterwards required that it should be moved to some other place. Difficulties multiplying upon Lewis, and being on the eve of a war with England, he likewife was disposed towards an accommodation; but his holiness refused to give ear to any proposal of that kind, unless he discovered the schismatical council, as he called it, convoked at Pifa, and restored Bologna to the holy see. Lewis would have been tractable on the first head; but declared that he would defend Bologna as strenuously as he would do Paris. The pope's obstinacy was prompted by Ferdinand the Catholic, whose double dealing and mysterious politics were now become proverbial in Europe, and who dreaded an union between the pope and Lewis.

On the first of September, the general council was opened The conatal Pisa, where the mutinous cardinals, who all of them lay cil opens are under the pope's censures, performed several consistorial acts. Pisa. This drew the indignation of his holiness upon the Florentines, who had been so lately obliged to him; and he laid them under an interdict, as being savourers of the schismatical conventicle at Pisa. To terrify them the more, he made the cardinal de Medici, legate of Perugia, legate of Bologna likewise. Those proceedings of the pope, with the visible coldness of the French king in supporting the council of Pisa, gave so great concern to the Florentines, that they opposed the farther proceedings of the council and the schismatical cardinals. But the intrigues of the Medici family and its friends in Florence, began now to appear by their effects. Soderini the gonfalonier, and his brother the cardinal of Volterra, aced as arbitrarily in the government as the Medici had ever done. The public council of the people was, indeed, the supreme authority; but it was under his direction or influence: and the Florentines were too quick-fighted a people not to perceive, that, though the forms of a popular constitution were preferved, the spirit of it might be extinguished. The gonfalonier and his brother continued to be avowed friends to the French king; and many of the Florentines, though otherwise averse to the Medici family, began, on that account, to talk less disrespectfully of it than they had done before. The cardinal Conduct of de Medici was young, active, polite, generous, and politic, beyond most men of his age. He had exact intelligence of all that passed in Florence, and was well acquainted with the dispositions of the public. Instead of attaching himself, as a man of genius inferior to his would have done, to the old approved friends of his family, he extended his benevolence, purse, and patronage, to all the Florentines, and equally caressed the enemies, as the friends, of his family. His credit at the court of Rome gave him many opportunities of serving them; and in a short time the minds of the Florentines became wonderfully disposed in his favour. His party was increased by the necessities of many noblemen, who, after ruining themselves by extravagance, had recourse to his finances; and the papal interdict, under which the city lay, disposed all who were religiously, or rather superstitiously, inclined, to favour him, that the interdict might be taken off through his interest. Those who were averse to him, were over-awed by his power as legate of Bologna; so that, upon the whole, the partizans of the Medici family now appeared in Florence as the cardinal de

6

Appeal of the Flo-

Medici.

openly as ever. NOTWITHSTANDING all this, the republic still maintained its own dignity, even in opposition to the pope, and appealed from his interdict to a holy council of the universal church. upon being In consequence of this appeal, they acted as if they had been interdiffed under no interdict, and obliged the priests to perform divine services in the churches. While matters were in this situation, the pope, Ferdinand the Catholic, and the Venetians, entered into a league for securing Italy against all foreigners, by which the infolence of pope Julius grew greater than ever. In a public confistory, where he appeared in great form and splendour, he degraded the contumacious cardinals who had opened opened the council of Pifa. After this, he folicited Ferdinand to hasten the march of the troops stipulated by the late treaty; and by their affistance he proposed, if all other means should fail, to restore the Medici family to its power in Florence.

THE impetuosity of the pope injured the family he wanted The Media to ferve. Its moderate friends could not bear the thoughts ci opposed. of being under a papal government; and the republic not only made preparations for defending itself, but raised a bank or fund out of the incomes of the ecclefiaftics, which was not to be expended, but restored to the original proprietors, unless they were attacked by the pope. This, however, met with great opposition; but when the grand council assembled, the gonfalonier made a long speech, inveighing against the pope and the Medici family; which had fuch weight, that the law at last passed.

THE flames of war must now have broken out in Tuscany, Ill success had it not been for the prudence of Pandolfo Petrucci, who of the remonstrated to his holiness, that the Florentines could only be Pisan driven into connections with France, that they might defend council. themselves, in case of an attack, in their own country; that they were by no means disposed in favour of the French king; that they had been forced, contrary to their own fentiments, to ferve him in a few immaterial points; and that the pope would much better come to his end by treating them with forbearance, and by endeavouring to recover Bologna, where he would meet with little resistance. Petrucci's advice, tho' known to proceed from interested motives, was followed; and it soon appeared, that the disposition of the Florentines did not by any means lead them to provoke his holiness. The schismatical cardinals, who had only fent their proxies to the council of Pifa, hearing of their being degraded and excommunicated by the pope, stopt at S. Domino, from whence the two Spanish cardinals repaired to Lucca; but the three French cardinals, together with the bishops of that nation, proceeded to Pifa under the guard of three hundred French lances, commanded by Foix, who were to relide at Pifa during the fellion of the council. The Florentines had not been informed of the destination of those troops till they were upon their march; and, partly from resentment, partly through prudential consilerations, they resolved to prohibit their admission into Pisa. I'hey respectfully gave their reasons for this prohibition to the French king, as well as his cardinals; but the cardinal of St. Malo, who was at their head, presuming on the great power of Lewis, secretly ordered the troops to proceed. Lewis, on the other hand, had promised to the Florentines that they should not proceed: upon which the republic sent Francesco Vet-Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

oppole, with force of arms, the entrance of any troops into the Pisan. At the same time they ordered the chief Pisans, who were suspected of favouring the French, to be sent to Florence, and quartered a body of troops in the neighbourhood of Pifa. This alienation of the Florentines from the French interest, and the cardinal's being obliged to countermand the march of the troops, gave fuch pleasure to the pope, that he for some time suspended the interdict that he had laid upon Pife and Florence. But the Florentines gave him still more substantial proofs how much they disliked the council of Pifa, by to the Flo-laying the members of it, who repaired to that city, under every possible mortification. They were not even treated in the streets with common decency; and the higher and more difinterested their pretexts of meeting were, the more they were ridiculed and blamed for proftituting the names of religion and virtue to the purposes of interest and ambition. Even the clergy of the church of Pifa locked up the doors of their cathedral, and refused to give the members entrance into it, or to lend their affistance towards the ceremonies required for opening the fession. The members complained to the Florentine magistracy, who ordered that they should be admitted into the church, and have the use of its furniture; but refused to oblige the clergy to affift at any religious worship. Those resolutions, as Guicciardin a rightly observes, were inconsistent with each other; but were owing to the divisions that prevailed amongst the Florentines themselves; for parties were so equally ballanced, that no question could be carried clearly had been at Pisa. THE parfimony of Lewis, and the poverty of Maximilian, still continued to divide Italy. The pope and the king of Spain endeavoured to effect an alliance between Maximilian and the Venetians; but Lewis, after various deliberations, fixed Maximilian in his interest with money, and promised to take into his service a body of Swis. This people began now to lose their esteem in Europe, through their mercenary disposition. They openly offered themselves for sale to the best bidder; and, the liberality of the pontiff provailing over the either for the French or the papal interest, by which both were disobliged. An accident freed the Pisans from the council; for a quarrel happening between a few French soldiers and the townsmen, in which some were wounded on both sides, the members of the council adjourned it to Milan, where they were received, if possible, with more detestation than they parlimony of Lewis, they refolved to invade the Milanefe. The wifer part of the French council advised Lewis by all means to make the Swiss his friends, which he might have done at the expence of ten thousand ducats; but he neglected The Swiss, before they began their expedition, sent a message to Venice, informing the senate, that they intended to drive the French out of Italy, and affift that republic, demanding a supply of provisions, a train of artillery, and five hundred horse, of all which they were destitute in their own country; and the Venetian senate readily granted their request. Lewis had not foreseen this. He had depended upon the advanced feason of the year, the inability of the Swifs by themselves to invade any country, the good state of the Milanese fortifications, and the bravery of his troops. Varese was the place of the Swiss rendezvous; and from thence they fent a defiance to Gaston de Foix, the French governor of Milan. who, being weak in infantry, was obliged to keep on the defensive, and posted himself at Lignago. The Swiss advanced to Galera, where de Foix offered them battle. The Swifs, expecting reinforcements, declined it; but foon after, their army amounting to fixteen thousand men, they obliged the French to retire to the city of Milan.

The pape reconciled icutines.

Mercinary disposition of the Swifs.

LEWIS, being now fensible of his error in not retaining Divisions the Swifs in his pay, ordered de Foix to offer them what in Floever money they required, if they would discontinue the in- rence. vafion; but, though mercenary, they were just to their engagements. The pope, however, and the Venetians, neglected to support them, either by sending them money, or making a diversion in their favour. This breach of contract made the Swiss offer, after they came within two miles of Milan, to return to their own country, if de Foix would advance them the money of which they had been disappointed by their allies, which was refused them. Lewis, perceiving the imminent danger of Milan, now made his utmost efforts for preserving that city, as well as Bologna. His chief dependence in Italy lay on the Florentines, whose country was situated between Milan and the Romagna. Lewis, therefore, insisted upon their employing the whole of their force in his favour, without Ripulating any certain number, and for their fecuring all the avenues in their country by which the enemy could penetrate into the Romagna. The Florentines were divided on this occasion. A great party amongst them was against extending their engagements with so faithless and ungrateful a people, as the Prench had always proved themselves to be towards Florence. They represented, that they had fulfilled all their stipulations with France; and that the only way to make themfelves Eез selves respectable in Italy was to maintain a neutrality, which would acquire to them the good-will of the Venetians, the pope, and the catholic king, besides saving themselves vast fums of money.

The gonfaavith the French.

SODERINI, the gonfalonier for life, whose power in lonier fides the state fell little short of that of a perpetual dictator, had no other dependence, for defending himself against his enemies, who were powerful and numerous, but the friendship of Lewis, for whom he always was a strenuous advocate. On this occasion, he represented the cause of France as being that of the Florentines; and that, if the pope, the Venetians, and the catholic king should prevail, they would turn their arms against their republic, and subvert its independency. He likewise infisted upon the services the French had in past times performed for the Florentines. All his arguments, however, were ineffectual, because of his notorious attachment to France, for bringing his countrymen to any decisive resolution; and Guicciardin the historian, who was then doctor of laws, tho' no more than twenty-nine years of age, was by them fent ambassador to the catholic king, or, as he is called, the king of Arragon; but, by his own account, with no very healing overtures. In the mean while, the French, who knew the necessities of the Swifs in the neighbourhood of Milan, refused to come to any accommodation with them; and, notwithstanding all Retreat of their menaces, of which they were very liberal, they broke she Swifs up their camp, and fet out for their own country, without from Italy, regard to the remonstrances of the pope and the Venetions. Upon their departure, the pope's troops and those of Spain entered the Romagna, where all the places belonging to the duke of Ferrara, excepting the fort of Genivolo, surrendered to them without resistance; but that fort was likewise taken, > after a brave defence, by affault, in which the garrison was cut in pieces. A few hours after, the duke of Ferrara retook it, and, in revenge, put all the Spaniards within it to the.

fword.

War in Italy continues.

THE city of Imola was the rendezvous for the armies of Spain and the holy see, which were now very strong. Fabrice Colonna commanded the Spaniards, under the vicercy of Noples; as did the cardinal de Medici the pope's forces, though without any military defignation. Their great object was to retake Bologna, which they accordingly invested, so as to prevent the French from throwing any fuccours into it. Fabricas Colonna had the command of the fiege; but it was carried on in a most aukward dilatory manner, the besiegers being every hour under apprehensions of an attack from the French. Cardinal

dinal de Medici was keen for forwarding the operations against the city, and was distrustful of the Spaniards, on account of their king's known infidelity. He was farther stimulated by the daily reproaches and messages he received from the pope. whose sanguine temper rendered him impatient. The viceroy of Naples took it amis, that an ecclesiastic, as the cardinal was, should presume to dictate in military operations; but Navarra, a Spanish general, to whom he paid great deference, represented to him so effectually the shame of a longer inactivity, that at last the siege was pushed with tolerable vigour. Upon this, the besieged demanded affishance from Poix, who accordingly came to their relief, and raised the fiege on the nineteenth day after it was undertaken; but Brefcia and Bergamo, in the mean time, were taken by the Venttians. De Foix, however, after providing for the fecurity of Bologna, marched with incredible expedition against the Vene. tians, and defeating their army, he befreged and retook Brifcia, where he put about eight thousand Venetians to the sword, amongst whom were many officers and persons of great distinction. The other towns, which had been retaken by the Venetians in Lombardy, followed the face of Brescia. De Foix then marched against the confederate army, which remained fill in the Bolognese. But the French king at this time was under great perplexities, arising from his uncertainty as to the disposition of Maximilian, and the war that had just broken out between him and the king of England. After various negociations, he had reason to suspect that Maximilian was refolved to detach himself from his alliance, and he endeavoured to replace the German troops in his pay by an equal number of Swifs. At the same time he applied to the pope for a peace; but was answered, that he was to expect none, unless he gave up Bologna and Ferrara to the holy fee.

UNDER those difficulties, Lewis applied to the Florentines. Coldness He endeavoured to persuade them to join in an expedition between against the Romagna; but so great was the public hatred the Florentowards the gonfalonier, that a Neapolitan ambassador was pub- tines and lickly carefied at Florence, and all the answers Lewis received French. to his applications were general and dilatory. The term of his engagements with the Florentines was now almost expired. and he pressed for a renewal of them. He even offered to be at all the expense of the war; but the Florentines not only continued to temporize, but publickly fent a minister to the court of Spain. The pope did not fail to encourage this coldness in the Florentines towards the French. He took off his interdicts from their city; and fent Giovanni Gozzadini, a Bolognese, and one of the clerks of the apostolic chamber, as his nuncio, to Florence. Lewis, upon this, thought he could have no dependence in Italy but upon the strength of his own arms, and ordered de Foix to give the enemy battle in the Bolognese, and, if he should succeed, to march against Rome itself. To palliate so irreligious a war, he pretended to have on his side the council of Pisa, to whose deputies the towns taken from the pope were to be furrendered. weight to his orders, de Foix received from France a great reinforcement of troops, confishing of five thousand German foot, five thousand Gascons, eight thousand Italians and French, and fixteen hundred lances, including two hundred Milaufe gentlemen. This army was to be joined by one hundred mea at arms, one hundred light horse, and a numerous train of artillery, under the duke of Ferrara.

Siege and battle of

DE FOIX, though a young man, and naturally impetuous, had great experience, and acted with vast caution. Ravenna. He advanced to the Bolognese, where the confederate army was encamped. It was inferior to his in numbers; but they every day expected a reinforcement of fix thousand Swiß, which would render them superior. Being upon the desensive, they made so good a choice of their ground, that the French could not attack them without vast disadvantage; and the catholic king advised his generals, and those of the pope, by all means to avoid a battle, because he every day expected that the French king would recal his army out of Italy to defend himself against the English. After various motions on both fides, the confederates retired under the walls of Imola, where the French durst not attack them. De Foix, that he might throw his enemies off their guard, affected to lead a life of pleasure and gallantry; but at last, after obtaining fome flight advantages, the two armies encamped within cannon-shot of each other, without either daring to begin an In the mean while, Maximilian concluded a truce with the Venetians, which made Lewis reiterate his orders to de Foix for giving the enemy battle. De Foix found that to be impracticable, and therefore he undertook the fiege of Ravenna, in hopes of drawing the confederates from their advantageous fituation to the relief of that city. The place was strong, both by art and nature, and defended by Antonio Colonna, who solemnly engaged the confederated generals to attempt to raise the siege. De Foix sound himself under great difficulties. His army was straitened for provisions, the Venetian fleet having blocked up the mouth of the Po, so that he could receive no supplies from the Ferrarese. Those disadvantages occasioned his making a vigorous, though inconstderate, attack upon the place, in which he was repulsed with great loss. The inhabitants, however, were so much daunted, that they entered into a fecret negociation with him about a furrender; but, while it was in dependence, the confederated generals, that they might keep their faith with Colenna, advanced to raise the siege. Upon this, de Foix, without hesitation, drew off his artillery, and resolved to give the enemy battle. Guicciardin has given us the speech said to have been made by de Foix, on this occasion; but with small appearance of its being genuine, the whole of it confifting of passages from the ancients on the like occasions. The numbers of both armics were nearly equal, by the reinforcements the confederates had received; and the battle was the most considerable of any that had been sought in Italy for some hundreds of years: but the French artillery was much better supplied than that of the confederates, who, after an obstinate dispute, were defeated. The Spanish infantry, however, having performed amazing acts of valour, prepared to retire in good order, and with the countenance of conquerors. This provoked de Foix, and he attacked them with a body of cavalry, but was himself killed; so that the Spaniards marched off in Foix killa kind of triumph, while most of their confederates were ed. either killed or taken prisoners. It is thought that about fixteen thousand men, four thousand of whom were French, perished in this battle, which is called that of Ravenna.

THE Florentines, all this while, affected an exact neutra- The lity, and protected such of the sugitives as took slight through French intheir dominions. After the battle, the French, enraged by terest dethe loss of their general, took Ravenna by storm, and treated clines in it in a most barbarous manner. After that, most of the cities Italy. of the Romagna furrendered to them; but the citadels of Forli and Imola held out. Notwithstanding this shew of success, the French army was ruined by the loss of their general, who was fucceeded in his command by Paliffe; but, though an officer of great merit, he was both ignorant of, and unable to execute, the schemes of de Foix. When the news of the defeat of Ravenna came to Rome, many of the cardinals, and the other ecclesiastics, earnestly applied to the pope, to incline him to peace, as they thought it certain that the victorious army would march directly to Rome, and be joined by most of the great lords of the Romagna. But Julio de Medici, a spurious branch of the Medici family, was fent by his brother the cardinal, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, to inform the pope of the true fituation of affairs. By his report, as well as by the representations of the Spanish. and Venetian ambassadors, it appeared, that the loss of the confederates, however confiderable, was easily reparable; that the Swiss were on the point of declaring for the confederacy; and that, in any event, the pope, in case Rome was attacked, or even taken, might retire to Venice, or to Naplu.

424

Negociations for peace.

JULIUS continued, as usual, long doubtful as to the course he should hold; but at last he told the cardinals that he inclined to peace, and defired them to employ the mediation of the Florentines for that purpose. His holiness, however, refused to acquaint them with the particular terms he was willing to accept of; and though he had ordered his gallies at Civita Vecchia to attend him at Rome, that he might make his escape from thence, yet he secretly made dispositions for continuing the war. Every day convinced him of the weakness of the French, whose generals were divided amongst themselves, and whose king was undetermined and irresolute. The duke of Urbino, nephew to the pope, tho' he had till then favoured the French, was so sensible of their weakness, that he now offered to join his uncle with two hundred men at arms, and four thousand foot; and the Swife were so exasperated against the French king, that they refused to fuffer his minister to be present at their deliberations. The consideration of all this disposed Lewis to treat with the pontiff, and privately to offer, as preliminaries to the treaty, to agree that Bologna should be restored to the holy see; and that Alfonso d'Este, duke of Ferrara, should resign to his holiness the towns he held in the Romagna, and pay him the accustomed tribute, and that he would abolish the council that had been summoned at Pi/a. All he demanded in return was a peace; that the duke of Ferrara should be absolved from his ecclefiaftical censures, and restored to his ancient rights and privileges, and the Bentivoglio family to their private estates; and that the cardinals who had adhered to the Pisan council, should be reinstated in their dignities.

Infidelity of the pope.

Though those terms were much better than the pope could have expected from a victorious enemy, yet he knew the condition of the French so well, that he secretly resolved to pay no regard to them. The state of his affairs, however, led him to temporize, and he signed the articles that had been offered him on the part of Lewis. Immediately after this he sent for the Spanish and Venetian ambassadors, and desired them to acquaint their masters, that he had no manner of intention to pay any regard to what he had signed, and that all he designed was to lull the French king assept. It soon appeared how justly his holiness had taken his measures. The Swiss were again in motion, and Lewis was obliged to recal Palisse from the Romagna. This delivered the pope from his tears, and he soon got the better of all his opponents in the Romagna and the ecclesiastical state, where the friends of France deserted her, after receiving from her vast sums of money.

On the third of May 1512, his holiness in person opened the Lateran council, which was declared to be holy and lawful, and was called in opposition to that of Pifa. So gross The Latean affront offered to Lewis put him in a rage, and he again ran counordered Palisse to point his march towards Rome. He soon cil opened. perceived that this proceeding would only ferve to make all the rest of Europe his enemies; and Palisse was ordered to stop in the Romagna, till the event of a negociation for a definitive treaty, that had been opened at Florence upon the footing of the preliminaries, should be known. Thither Lewis sent the president of Grenoble, with full powers to put the finishing hand to such a treaty; but that was not now in his option. The cardinal of York, ambassador from England, had, by his master's order, declared for the pope and his Maximilian had ratified the truce with the Venetians: and the Catholic king was preparing to fend Gonfalvo with an army against the French, for the security of Naples. The pope, moved by those and other encouraging appearances, rejected the form of the treaty that was presented to him on the part of France, though agreeable to the preliminaries he himself had signed; but he pretended to do it by the advice of the college of cardinals, and particularly the ministers of England and Spain, and after a solemn debate in the confiftory.

THE cardinal de Medici was all this while prisoner at Mi- The cardilan, where he was treated with the highest honours and re-nol de Mespect, as if he had been a conqueror instead of a captive; but dici a prithe pope, to shew how little he valued the French king, pub. Joner at lished a monitory, requiring him, under ecclesiastical penal-Milan. ties, to release the cardinal. He proceeded farther. He sent de Medici a power to absolve from censures, all soldiers who would promise no longer to bear arms against the church, and to grant Christian burial to all the dead. The effect which those indulgencies had was incredible, and the French troops flocked in such numbers to the cardinal for absolutions. that clerks were wanting for expediting the patents of abso-This daring infult on a crowned head left the members of the council of Pifa nothing to expect but contempt and danger to their own persons. They were every where treated as members of a schismatical conventicle, and the French subjects and soldiers expressed the highest veneration for cardinal de Medici, as being the true apostolical legate. Lewis was obliged to put up with all those affronts, being forced forced to recal part of his troops from Italy to defend himfelf against the English. At the time the battle of Ravema was fought, the term of his league with the Florentines was almost expired; but the reputation his arms acquired by that battle, prevailed with the Florentines to renew it for five years, he obliging himself to employ six hundred lances in their defence, if attacked; while the Florentines engaged to defend his Italian dominions, in the like case, with tour hundred men at arms. The Florentines, however, were so cautious as to except out of this treaty the town of Cotignola, upon which the holy see had some claims.

Irruption of the Swifs into Italy.

But the peace of Italy was now more than ever in danger. The Swifs had conceived such a hatred towards the French king, that they enlifted under the pope's banners, for a Rhenish florin a man, in such numbers, that his treasury was insufficient to supply the enlisting money, inconsiderable as it was. About twenty thousand of them assembled at Coria, and the emperor granted them a free passage through his dominions. The French under Palisse were in no condition to relist them. Being furnished with a good train of artillery by the Venetians, whose army they joined, they sell directly into the Milanese, Palisse retiring every where before them, and losing post after post. The French had now no hopes but in being able to defend fome of their capital towns and cities, and in the Swifs disbanding themselves for want of pay, in which the pope was very backward. The Florentines, on the requisition of Lewis, had sent three hundred men at arms to Lombardy, of whom one hundred were put into garrison at Brescia, and another hundred at Bergame, and the rest in the different towns in the Milanese; in which the French, amounting not to above ten thousand men, their German mercenaries included, shut themselves up; but all of a sudden Maximilian ordered his subjects, who most of them were Tirolese, to leave the French service, which they did. Palisse then despaired of being able any longer to desend the Milanese. Cremona and Bergamo revolted from the French, and were received in the name of Maximilian Sforza, the son of Lewis the Moor. Palisse was not able, for want of money, to pay his troops, even to guard the passage of the Adda; so that in a few days all the open country of the duchy of Milan was evacuated by the French, who now thut themselves up in the castles and fortified places.

DURING the stumult of this retreat, the cardinal de Medici was put under a guard, which was to carry him into France; but happily for him, he was rescued on the road by Escape of a Venetian nobleman, while the French were beat out of Pa- the cardivia with loss. The fame of the conquest of Milan reaching nal de Swifferland, the Swifs poured into Lombardy in greater num- Medici. bers than ever to fight in the cause of the holy league, as the pope's confederacy was called. The cities of Parma and Piacenza voluntarily submitted to the pope. The Swifs took possession of Locarno; the Grisons laid hold of the Valteline and Chiavenna, as the Venetians did of such places as lay most convenient for them. Fregofo, one of the exiled Genoese, but then in the Venetian service, with a body of horse and foot, expelled all the French out of Genoa, of which he was chosen doge. All the Romagna declared for the holy league; and the duke of Urbino, at the head of the pope's troops, expelled Bentivoglio and his party out of Bologna, while his holine's profecuted them with ecclesiastical censures, and threatened to lay under an interdict any place that should receive them. As to the citizens, who had always expressed an implacable hatred to the papal government, he fleeced and treated them with the utmost severity; and it was thought that, had not death prevented him, he intended to have demolished their city. Thus the papal power, by the obstinacy, the policy, the courage, the dissimulation, and the abilities of one old man, was raised from a low state to the highest pitch of power it had ever known.

THE pope had now only Alfonso d'Este duke of Ferrara, The pope to reduce; and towards him he behaved with his usual mix- recovers ture of obstinacy and diffimulation. The duke was beloved Bologna. for his many noble noble qualities. He was a near relation. to the Catholic king, who began with some jealousy to behold the aggrandizement of the church; and he was highly befriended by the Colonnas. His holiness durst not refuse fuch powerful fuitors in the duke's favour. He granted him a safeguard to and from Rome, and behaved to him with civility; but after various conferences, he pressed the duke to exchange Ferrara for Afti. The duke obstinately rejecting this proposal, his holiness would have put him under arrest, had he not been favoured by the Colonna family, who lay under the highest obligations to him, and who forced his way through the pope's guards, by which he reached his own dominions by sea.

But the Florentines were the greatest eye-sores to his ho-He deceives lines. He could not bear the haughty independency they the Flomaintained; and the assistance they had lately given to France, rentines, marked them out as objects of his vengeance. His minister, the cardinal of Sian, and the Venetian general Baglioni, had solemnly folcomnly engaged for the fafe return of one hundred and twenty Florentine men at arms, and fixty light horse, who served in These were commanded by the French army, to Tuscany. Luca Savello, while the remainder, under Francesco Torello, were in garrison at Brescia; but in defiance of all faith and honour, while those few Florentines were lying near Cremona, they were furrounded by two thousand of the pope's and the Venetian infantry, who plundered and disarmed them; and though Nicolo Capponi, the Florentine ambassador, had obtained a pass from the same cardinal, and had retired to Cafal Cervagio, yet he infifted upon the marquis of Montferrat delivering him up as a prisoner. The French, however, were still in possession of Brescia, Crema, Lignago, the castles of Milan, Genoa, and Cremona, and some other fortresses in the Milanese, all which they were enabled to keep, not so much by their own strength, as through the jealousies which began now to prevail amongst the parties of the holy league, and which were affisted by the insolence and avarice of the Swiss favoured by the pope.

who apply to the king of Spain.

THE Florentines, at this time, were in a disagreeable situation. Their neutrality had left them no friends, and the bad management of the French exposed them to the resentment of the pope. They had, therefore, nothing to trust to but the moderation with which they had acted during the late war, by which they had withdrawn their countenance from the council of Pifa, harboured the Spaniards and Neapelitans after the battle of Ravenna, and performed other good offices to his Catholic majesty, who had, in person, thanked their ambassador, and offered them his friendship, provided they would withdraw their affistance from Bentivoglio, and formally disavow the Pisan conventicle. The dissentions that prevailed in Florence, prevented the government from coming to any resolution; and thus, in tact, they gratuitously observed a neutrality, for which they might have been paid by his Catholic majesty.

Congress at

SODERINI, the gonfalonier, still maintained his power Mantua. in Florence; and it was the interest of the pope to divest him of it, and to substitute the Medici family in his room. A congress was appointed at Mantua, by the members of the holy league, at which the bishop of Goritz was to assist on the part of the emperor. The pope fent his datary, Lorenzo Pucci, a Florentine, to Florence, on pretence of inviting that state to join in the league, and in the expences of the war against France; but his real design was to form intrigues in favour of the Medici family. The Florentines would have furnished money to the league, but declined to enter into a war against against the French king; and when they called upon Maximilian to fulfil his engagements with them, he in a manner laughed at them; but offered, if they would advance him forty thousand ducats, to take their part against the pope, if he should attack them. The Florentines would have advanced the money, had there been the least appearance of their being benefited by it; and their divisions made them neglect to take any means for their fafety, either by disciplining their own troops, or by hiring others. In the mean while, the Spanish army in the Bolognese mutinging for want of pay, part of them fell into Tuscany, which gave a fresh alarm to the Florentines, who were in no condition to result them.

THE sum of the conserences, at the congress of Mantua, The return turned upon the reinstating Maximilian Sforza in the duchy of the Meof Milan, and forming a confederacy of all the Italian states dici family to clear Italy of foreigners. This naturally brought under 10 Flothe deliberation of the congress the state of Florence, which rence rewas governed by an avowed friend and partizan of the French. folved on. Julian de Medici, as agent for his own family, and Bernardo de Bibienna, on the part of the pope, remonstrated upon the practicability of restoring the Medici to Florence, whose best foldiers were either dispersed in Lombardy, or shut up in Bres-This design was communicated to Vittorio Soderini, brother to the gonfalonier, whom the Florentines had sent to take care of their interest at the congress, and who informed his principals of their danger. Goritz, at the same time, acquainted Soderini that the viceroy of Naples was to march at the head of his troops, to oblige the Florentines to readmit the Medici; but that they might still avert the danger, by gratifying the emperor, and making a handsome present to the viceroy. Soderini had no commission to treat on those matters; and no application of any kind being made to the viceroy, the congress broke up, after resolving that the expedition against Florence should take place.

FOR this purpose, cardinal de Medici was declared legate of The Rate all Tuscany, and was impowered by the pope, to order all the of Flofoldiers of the ecclesiastical state to attend and assist him, rence inwhile the viceroy, who had appealed the mutiny of his army, vaded. returned to the Bolognese, and put it in motion against Florence. This expedition was by no means agreeable, to some of the neighbouring powers, and particularly the duke of Uhbino, who in defiance of the pope's orders, and the most earnest representations of the Medici, refused to suffer the troops under his command to march, or to lend the Spaniards any alfiltance. The viceroy however proceeded; but after he had entered the Florentine territories, he was met by ambassadors from that state, who represented to him the moderate and friendly behaviour of the Florentines towards the catholic king during the late war, and defired to know what his demands

Imprudence rentines.

THE viceroy frankly answered, that the confederated flates of the Flo- of Italy could not be easy, while they saw at the head of the Florentine government a man intirely in the interest of the French, who had not yet given over thoughts of subduing all Italy; and that his master, and his allies, expected they would restore the cardinal de Medici, who by his brother's death was now become the head of that family, and Julian, to their birthrights in Florence. Notwithstanding this answer. the viceroy continued his march, without waiting for a reply from Florence, where every thing was in confusion. magistrates had neither generals nor troops on whom they could depend; and all they could do was to order their ambassadors to throw themselves at the feet of the pope, and to endeavour to amuse the viceroy by making him magnificent offers. The pope proved inexorable as usual, and the viceroy, without discontinuing his march, came within fifteen miles of Florence. He then fent a message to the Florentines, demanding that the gonfalonier should be dismissed from his office: and "that the Medici c should enjoy their country, not as heads of the government, but as private persons, living under subjection to the laws and to the magistracy in all things, conformably to the other citizens." In all other respects, the government was to revert to its former order. Buonaccorsi, an Italian author, says, that the viceroy likewife required the Florentines to lend him one hundred thoufand ducats, which they obstinately refused to do.

THE feeming moderation of the vicercy with regard to Irrefelution of the the Medici and the gonfalonier, divided the Florentines. Spaniards. Some were for submitting to the terms; while others suggested, that the real design of the viceroy was to gain admittance into Florence, at the head of his army, to abolish the constitution, and to re-establish the tyranny of the Medici. They observed at the same time, that a little firmness would disconcert the viceroy so much, that he would be obliged, for want of money, to withdraw his troops from Tuscary. The latter counsel therefore took place; and it was resolved to fend a strong garrison, under Luca Vitelli, to Prata, to stop the viceroy's progress. This shew of resolution started him. He was at the head of that body of Spanish foot, which, to their immortal honour, had revired unbroken frem the battle of Ravenna; but he was destitute both of money and provisions for their subsistence, and had with him only two pieces of ordnance. Upon the whole, therefore, he stopped short, and defired the Florentines to consider better of his proposals.

[·] Guicciardini, book ii.

THE gonfalonier convoked the great council, and before A treate them offered immediately to relign his office; but at the same entered up. time described, in the most earnest terms, the improbability on and of their preserving their liberties, if the Medici, upon any defeated. pretext whatsoever, were suffered to return to Florence. Notwithstanding his remonstrances, the council came to a resolution to re-admit the Medici into their city as private subjects, but to suffer the last extremity, rather than remove the gonfalonier from his office, This resolution laid the vicerov under vast difficulties; and, at last, he proposed to leave Tuscany without infisting on the deposition of the gonfalonier, if the Florentines would re-admit the Medici as private citizens, and pay him thirty thousand ducats, and suffer him to draw provisions for his army from Prate. The Florentine magistates in general were for accepting those terms, and ambassadors were named for signing the treaty; but the gonfalonier, who privately opposed all accommodation, withheld their dispatches so long, that the viceroy's army was, in the mean time, reduced to the alternative either of starving or taking Prate. They brought the two pieces of ordnance before its walls; but one of them burit on the first discharge. The Spaniards, however, ran to the assault with Prato fuch interpidity, that, mounting the walls, the garrison, formed. which had been levied in haste, and was equally cowardly as undisciplined, betook themselves to slight. Their behaviour gave the Spaniards a right to treat the place as taken by ftorm; and most horrible scenes of lust, cruelty, and sacrilege ensued. The Florentine garrison threw down their arms; and fome writers make the number of defenceless people that perished on this occasion, to amount to five thousand men. Those who survived the sword were made prisoners; but the cardinal de Medici saved from violation the women, who took refuge in the great church, by placing a guard over them. After Prate was taken, the Pistoians, without withdrawing from the subjection of the Florentines, made their peace with the viceroy, upon engaging to supply his army with provisions.

THE loss of Prate, which happened on the last of August, A. D. 1512, created productions commotions in Florence. The gonfalonier, who was known to be the occasion of this disaster, The Meloft all his credit, and with that all his courage. Two young dici renoblemen, Paul Vettori and Antonfrancesco Albizi, friends to stored to the Florence.

the Medici, held a consultation with Julian de Medici, and others of that party, at a country feat, where they were joined by another young nobleman, Bartolomeo Valori, and they resolved to enter the palace of the gonfalonier with an armed band, and force him to refign his post. fign they casily executed; meeting with no restistance, they ferzed the gonfalonier in his apartment, threatened to kill him if he aid not leave the palace, which he immediately did, on the conspirators promising that his life should be fale The magistrates immediately were affembled, and required to deprive the gonfalonier of his office; to which they submitted with great reluctance. Leaving Florence, the gonfalonier intended to go to Rome; but receiving intelligence from his brother, the cardinal of Volterra, that the pope, hearing he was loaded with treasure, intended to seize him, he escaped by sea to Ragusa.

The government reav modelled.

THE settlement of the state of Florence became now the great object of confideration with that people. were no longer masters of their own affaus; tho' the cardinal de Medici for some time acted with so much seeming moderation, that the less considerate amongst them still thought themselves free. The first step the magistracy made, was to fend ambailadors to the viceroy, who were introduced to him by the interest of the cardinal de_ Medici. They agreed to enter as parties into the holy league, and to pay to Maximilian the forty thousand ducats that had been demanded from them by the bishop of Garitz, and which the Media tamily had promised should be paid upon their being restored to their country. The viceroy was to receive for his own use twenty thousand ducats, and for the use of his army eighty thousand, of which one moiety was to be paid immediately, and the other in two months, he engaging, on the first payment being made, to evacuate the dominions of Florence, and to restore all the places he had taken from that republic. Matters were next compromised with the catholic king upon easy terms. A mutual agreement was entered into between them, for the defence of each other dominions in Italy; and the Florentines agreed to take into their pay two hundred of his men at arms, to be commanded by the marquis deila Palude, to whom the cardinal de Media had privately promifed the command of the Florentine forces. As to the affairs of the Medici family, that cardinal continued to affect great moderation. He accepted of the restitution of himself, his family, and friends, as private citizens, but referving to themselves a power of redeeming their estates that had been conficated, by repaying the money that had been expended in purchasing or improving them.

S E C T. IX.

ing the History of Florence, after Restoration of Jouse of Medici, and the different Revolutions: Government, till it fell to the House of Lorrain.

Florentines obtained those terms through the policy Views of he Catholic king, who disapproved of the inordinate the Spa-1 and violence of the pope, and whose real intention niards. referve the liberties of the Florentines. His viceroy had r that purpose; but the cardinal de Medici and his fa-I far different views: they knew that they could not. e citizens, be fafe in their own country, after intronto it an army of Spaniards, which had shed so much blood, and done them so much damage. They a spirit of independency still prevailed in Florence, majority was for continuing a popular government. Florentines had even gone so far as to enact by a new The office at the perpetuity of the office of gonfalonier should of gonhed, and that that office should be held only for a falonier at all those citizens who had gone through the great much f flare, either at home or abroad, should be added to cil of eighteen, by whom the most weighty affairs public were determined. Thus, all who had borne e of gonfalonier, who had been of the balia, or em-1 embassies, or as commissioners of the war, were added puncil, which confequently now confifted of men of the experience and abilities in the state. Those points tled, Baptista Ridolfi, a citizen of an unexceptionracter, was chosen gonfalonier for the ensuing year. The Medi-IE proceedings by no means fuited the views of the ci warp amily. The cardinal attached himself to the young, the governt, and indigent nobility, who were at that time very ment of is in Florence; and not only the divisions, but the Florence. s of the state were so great, that money could not for the first payment of the viceroy, who, in daily ion of it, still continued with his army in Prato. linal, who had brought over to his interest some of ish general officers, represented to the viceroy, that of the first payment was owing to the French invhich was still powerful in the republic, and that s a defign to recal and reinstate in his office the late ier. His arguments had fuch weight, that he prekh the viceroy to remain neuter, while he attempted te a scheme for overthrowing the newly modelled All of a sudden he -the Florentine government. Florence at the head of a large body of Italian offi-. HIST. VOL. XXXVI.

cers and foldiers, and repaired directly to the houses of his friends, the magistrates being over-awed by the neighbourbood of the Spanish army from making any relistance. Next day his party, with Julian de Medici at its head, forced their way into the town-house, and the palace of the magistrates, where they seized upon all the public plate, without regard to the gonfalonier or the magistrates, who were obliged to submit. The people were then summoned by the sound of the great bell to the square of the palace, where they were no some affembled, than they were furrounded by an armed force, under the direction of the Medici and their friends.

New altegovernment take place.

THO' both Guicciardini, and Paul Jovius, called by the rations of Italians Giovio, wrote at the time, and tho' the former was present on the spot, and one of the chief magistrates of Rerence, yet they differ as to the particulars of the alteration of the Florentine government that now took place. Gniceardini says, that the supreme power (which was the same with that of the balia) was lodged in fifty citizens, who were to be nominated or recommended by the cardinal or his friends. Giovio says, that fifteen persons were created with a power to elect fixty other citizens, the most distinguished for their attachment to the Medici family, who with their electors were to form a standing council for the government of the state. Upon the whole, it is plain that the Florentines owed the loss of their liberties to their own divisions. By a decree of their supreme assembly, their government was reduced to the form it had when the Medici were expelled in 1494: but that family now assumed more power than ever; a military guard was placed at their palace, and they disused all the modest appearances of their foresathers.

The Sparey withdraws.

THE viceroy, receiving his first payment, marched to Brefnish vice- cia, which was then belieged by the Venetians; but D'Aubign, the French governor, chose to surrender it to the Spanish general. The negociations, heart-burnings, and differences, that afterwards broke out amongst the members of the holy league, are foreign to this part of our history, which con-The pope's vast projects seemed to cerns Tulcany alone. grow with his years. He relumed his designs against Firrara: he gave Maximilian thirty thousand ducats for his interestin Sienna, which he bestowed upon his nephew, the duke of Urbino: he demanded Carfagnana, which, during his contests with the duke of Ferrara, had been seized by the Lucquese; and took measures for becoming master of Medena and Perugia. In short, he acted up to the character he affected, that of being the deliverer of Italy from all foreigners; and towards the latter part of his life, he disposed the Swiss to affist him in driving the Spaniards out of Naples. He Death of was, however, greatly chagrined at feeing the independent popt Julipower which the cardinal de Medici had assumed in Florence, us, But he died while meditating the above, and other great deligns, on the twenty-first of February, 1913.

UPON the entrance of the cardinals, who were in number who is face twenty-five, into the conclave, for the election of a new ceeded by pope, it was thought that they would have imposed some re- the cardi-Arictions on the pontifical power, but though they began naldeMefuch a work, the delign was foon dropped; and the cardinal dici, Leo de Medici, who was afterwards so well known by the name of Leo the Tenth, which he assumed, was unanimously chosen pope. He entered upon his pontificate with vast advantages, He was but thirty-seven years of age, a circumstance hardly ever known before: he had borne his misfortunes with wonderful moderation, and had furmounted them with equal address: he equalled, if not surpassed, the greatest of his forefathers in munificence, in the love of the fine arts, and in liberality towards men of genius in all professions; and his mildness and good-nature were as conspicuous as his other great qualities. Notwithstanding all that has been said, he was at the bottom void of all religion and honour, and privately addicted to the practice of almost every vice that enters into the human composition. After his election, which had been irreproachably regular, and free from all simoniacal practices, he was crowned with a splendour and magnificence to which Rome had been for many years a stranger, the expences of his coronation-day amounting to one hundred thoufand ducats.

LEO was inclined to his predecessor's plan of driving all His chaforeigners out of Italy; and for many reasons, that may be rader, and feen in the course of this history, he was far from being a policy. favourer of the French king, who was making new dispositions for invading Milan. Lee, after his secretion to the nonrificate, continued to govern Florence as a temporal prince, and kept up a close correspondence with the famous Machiawel, the Florentine secretary, for the better management and regulation of that state. Under so powerful a patronage, it was no wonder if the Florentines renewed their claims upon Pietra Santa and Mutrone, which was still detained from them by the Lucquese. The latter, at first, threw themselves for protection upon the catholick king; but they foon found themselves obliged to submit to the arbitration of the pope, who ordered them to restore the places in question to the Florentines; and that the two flates should enter into a perpetual peace and consederacy with each other. By the va-Ff2 his party as fuited his interest; but he never lost fight of the aggrandizement of his own family. He raised Lorenzo, his elder brother's fon, who was but a very young man, to the government of Florence, which the French king offered to guarantee to the house of Medici, provided his holiness would forego his engagements with the emperor and the king of Spain. The deligns that Leo had in view for his brother Julian, were equally great. He paid the emperor forty thoufand ducats for the mortgage of Modena, which, together with Reggio, Parma, Piacenza, and the Ferrarese, when an opportunity should offer, he designed to make Julian sovereign of. At the same, time his holiness procured a marriage between Julian and Philiberta, fifter to the duke of Savoy, and to the French king by the mother's side, and enabled the bridegroom to settle upon his bride, as a dowry, one hundred The French king was in hopes, that thousand ducats. the conclusion of this match would be favourable to his designs upon the Milanese; but while Lee flattered him in that opinion, he was concerting measures for defeating them, by entering into fecret engagements with the emperor, the king of Spain, and other states. Francis I. who was not above twenty-two years of age, and possessed of great vivacity and courage, was now upon the throne of France, and preparing to march to Italy; which, notwithstanding all the oppolition of the Swifs, he effected to the amazement of all Europe. The pope, by this time, had ordered his nephew Lorenzo, at the head of the Florentine army, to take the field and march into Lombardy, for the defence of Milan, his brother Julian then lying ill of a fever at Florence. But Lee had no apprehension of the French being able to pass the Alps, with so little loss as they had sustained: and Palisse, who commanded their van, had been so wonderfully rapid in his motions, as to surprise and take prisoner Prospero Colonna, the ablest and most experienced general in Italy, and the person on whom Lee depended the most for opposing the French. His capture threw Lee into a kind of despondency; and he sent orders to Lorenzo, who was advanced with his army as far as Modena, to flacken his march against the French. Lorenzo took that opportunity of retaking the castle of Rubiera, and soltered for some time in the territories of Modena and Reggio; while the pope sent a trusty agent to make his peace with the French king. whom he endeavoured to amuse at the same time by entering into a treaty with him, under the mediation of the duty of Sawy. Giulian de Medici had been raised to the purp

The pope under de-Spondency.

1515.

by Leo, though his birth was illegitimate, and was on this occasion an useful counsellor to him, by preventing him from returning Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, and Bologna to Bentivoglio; all which he was inclined to do to please the French. Instead of that, Giulian persuaded him absolutely to declare against the French king, though he had now advanced as far as Vercelli, and had taken Alessandria, the key of the duchy of Milan. The Swifs were all this while in Italy, and offered themselves to the best bidders; but indifcriminately plundered friends and foes when money could They were in the pay of the holy league; but without waiting to receive it regularly, they generally broke open the coffers of their paymasters: and this disorderly behaviour encouraged the French king to endeavour to bring them over from the interest of the pope and the king of Spain. Some difficulties intervening in this negociation, Francis proceeded to the conquest of Milan, which he easily effected; and thereby brought the Swift into his terms. But this treaty, by the arrival of a fresh body of rapacious Swis, was broken almost as soon as made; and Lorenzo de Medici, whose army consisted of seven hundred men at arms, eight hundred light horse, and four thousand soot, all of them Florentines, to keep the Swiss in humour with the pope, had affisted them in getting provisions.

THE state of Lombardy was at this time very precarious State of and unfettled. The French king was with a powerful army at Lombarthe gates of Milan: the viceroy of Naples lay near Piacenza dy. with another army: Lorenzo de Medici was within Piacenza, at the head of the ecclesiastical and Florentine troops: Alviano, the Venetian general, and his army, were in the Cre. monese to affift the French king; and an army of thirty-five thousand Swiss were encamped near Milan, undetermined what part to take, but filled with rage for pay and plunder. Upon the whole, however, the French were in the fairest road of success; and the politic pope began to renew his correspondence for an accommodation with that king: His nephew Lorenzo de Medici, if possible, even out did his holiness in dissimulation. He applied secretly, by agents, to Francis, and apologized for being obliged, in compliance with his uncle the pope, to appear in the field against him at the head of the Florentine army. All those secret correspondences were discovered by the viceroy of Naples, who considered himself and his master as being little better than betrayed by the pope and Lorenzo. He pressed Lorenzo to pass the Po, and join him; but ercie being now distrustful of the other, both armies retur .ed to their former quarters.

The Swiss battle of

It is certain, that the Swift army, which was forty thoubeat at the fand strong, might at that time have given laws to all Italy; but their mercenary disposition, and their divisions, rendered The French army Marigna- them hated and suspected by all parties. lay between them and that of the Spaniards and Florentines: and, in general, they were not ill-disposed towards an accommodation with Francis. To prevent this, their leader and countryman, the cardinal of Sion, harangued them in to animating a manner, that they appeared to be, as it were, polsessed of a frenzy for fighting the French; and, marching out of Milan, they attacked them, though it was almost dark, at Marignano. Night alone, and the valour of the Franch cavalry, prevented their army from being totally routed. The battle was renewed by day-break; but Francis, during the night, had made so good a disposition of his artillect, that the Swift were terribly galled in their approach; and Alview, the brave Venetian general, coming up with his army, attacked them in the rear; so that, after performing prodigies of valour, the Swifs were obliged to return, but in good order, to Milan. This battle, the bloodiest that had been fought for many years in Italy, was perhaps the most glorious the French ever obtained, as the Swifs nation, till that day, had been deemed invincible. Trivulzi, the Italian general in the French pay, who faid he had been in eighteen battles, observed, that all of them were like children's play, compared to that of Marignano. Though the Swift left about ten thousand men dead on the field, and the French lost about fix thousand, yet the latter did not venture to pursue their enemies to Milan; from whence the Swiss returned to their own country. Thus, all the Milanese, by degrees, again sell under the power of the French.

Distress of the pope:

THE pope and the Florentines were conscious to themselves how ill they had deserved, by their temporizing, of all parties, but of the French especially. The viceroy of Naples, who had fufficiently discovered the double dealing of his holines, and his nephew, after borrowing fix thouland ducats of the latter prepared to return with his army to his government: • that Lee had now very little dependence on any thing but the French king's reverence for his character, and his own at of negociation. Seeing that Francis was making disposition for recovering Parma and Piacenza, as belonging to the duchy of Milan, and for attacking the state of Florence, which he thought himself as much interested to defend as if is haddilonged to the church, he may be the duker Sawy, and his nuncio, the bishop of Tricarico, Megacilite widt die gran The duke, wathin or too. king.

Ir must be acknowledged, that, on this occasion, Lee be- bis address haved with wonderful address. Though naturally cautious relieues and timid, he affected the courage and resolution of his pre-bim. decessor Julius; and imposed so far upon Francis, who dreaded the papal thunder, that he entered into an alliance with Leg. They mutually stipulated to defend the states of Italy; and Francis agreed to become the defender and protector of the pope and his dominions, the house of Medici, and the state of Flerence, and to give pensions and preferments in France to cardinal Giulian and Lorenzo. The pope, however, was obliged to recal his troops from Verena; and, upon the valuable compensation of Cervio supplying Milan with salt, to yield to the French king Parma and Piacenza. As to the Florentines. Francis infifted upon a point of honour; and it was left to the duke of Savoy to decide, whether, by their behaviour. they had not violated their engagements with his predecellor.

ALL this while, the viceroy of Naples found pretexts for continuing with his army in Lombardy, which put the pope and Lorenzo under dreadful apprehensions; so that the latter made his court in the most abject manner to Francis, by the pope's direction. Francis, however, was a prince of too much penetration to be imposed upon by his holiness, who made great difficulties of ratifying the late peace, though strongly importuned to it by the bishop of Tricerice. Lee could not, without sensible mortification, part with Parma and Piacenza; and he was not without hopes, that the Swiss would again declare against the French. Francis saw, into the reasons of his management, and made dispositions for entering Tuscany, which frightened Lee so much, that he ratified the treaty, with some modifications; one of which was, that the Fhrentines should be absolved from all imputation of having contravened their engagements with Lewis. Francis was, at this time, fully bent upon the conquest of Naples, and proposed a personal interview, which afterwards took place, with the pope, for granting his army a passage through the ecclesiastical dominions. Lee durst not directly refuse him any thing; but with greate difficulty persuaded him to delay his expedition during the life of Ferdinand the catholic king, who was now very agod and infirm.

On the 8th of December, 1515, the pope and Francis, His interwho wissertended by a small settinue, met together at Bologna, view with Phie duke of Farrard, had great reasons to be diffatisfied with Francis a the pope, and the Medici, family, who covered his possessions, Bologna, and presended, that all, his estates belonged to the church. The duke, sensible of their intentions, had entered into secret connections with the king of France, who, in the interview he had with the pope, pressed him to return Modena and Reggio to the duke. His holiness, against his will, was obliged to comply with this request, on condition of his being reinbursed the forty thousand ducats that had been paid to Maximilian for Modena. Francis, at the same time, pressed him to an accommodation with the duke of Urbino, whose effate his holiness had likewise marked out for his own family, and who had refused to serve under Lorenzo. It required all the art of his holiness, though one of the most artful men alive, to avoid complying with this request; but, at last, by his wonderful address, the affair was compromised, and he persuaded the king shamefully to abandon the interest of the duke, who had fully informed him of the pope's double dealing. tiff granting to the king certain ecclesiastical revenues and privileges in France to a vast amount, the king, at the same time, at Leo's request, withdrew his protection from all the states of Tuscany, where the Medici family was now in a manner absolute, though the Lucquese offered him twenty-five thousand ducats for his friendship. All those and various other matters being settled, Francis lest Bologna, highly pleased with the thoughts that, by his power and policy, he had brought his holine's to comply with all his demands.

con-

A peace.

LEO, however, was determined, if possible, to elude of the pope, them. From Bologna he repaired to Florence, where he had the ablest heads in Europe to consult with. Here he found pretexts for eluding the restitution of Modena and Reggie; while Francis, after disbanding the greatest part of his army, and leaving the duke of Bourbon his lieutenant in the Milanele, returned to France in the beginning of the year 1516. His departure was highly agreeable to the pope; and the states of Tulcany being now without any protector, his holiness formed a design, by the help of the Florentines, to render the bishop of Petrucci, who was his creature, master of Sienna, which he effected, in hopes of afterwards subjecting it to the Medici family. In the mean while, Ferdinand the catholic king Death of died, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, at Madrid. He Ferdiwas a prince of valt penetration, perseverance, and address, and may justly be considered as the founder of the Spanish monarchy, which he reared with fo much pains and difficulty, that, notwithstanding his uninterrupted prosperity, the diffe-... very of America in his reign, and his futing forty years on the throne of Spain, he left no money behind him.,.

nand alfairs of Italy.

> THE death of Ferdinand freed the French king from his obligation not to attack Naples during his life-rime; but, while he was meditating that conquest, his own instehy of Milan was attacked by Maximilian, who obliged the French troops there, under Lautree, to retire under the cannon of Milan. Francis had, by this time, come to an accommodation with the Swiss, and had taken ten thousand of them into his pay; but, the like number being in the service of Maximilian, they were all of them unwilling to come to action; and the cantons deliberated upon recalling all their fubjects from both services, to prevent their being under the necessity of butchering one another. Maximilian's usual indigence and irrefolution delivered Milan from her danger, and he inglo-The French king strongly riously returned to Germany. suspected that Maximilian's attempt upon the Milanese had been favoured by the pope, and called upon him for the performance of his late engagements, by fending to his affiftance five hundred men at arms, and paying three thousand Swifs for the defence of the Milanese, according to compact. The truth is, the pope equally hated Francis and Maximilian, and, by daring to disablige neither, he was suspected by both. At first, he declined giving any positive answer, as to the pay of the Swifs; and offered to fend Florentines into Lombardy, instead of his own troops. Upon the return of Maximilian to Germany, he ordered Lorenzo, who commanded the Florentines, to present Francis with a sum of money, and to renew his professions of attachment to the French interest. All this was done to amuse Prancis, while his holiness was attempting to make himself master of the duchy of Urbino by force of arms. The name of that celebrated duke was Francesco Marie della Rovere. He was nephew to the late pope Julius, but personally obnoxious to Lee. He had, in a fit of passion, murdered the cardinal of Pavia, whom he accused of the loss of Bologna to the holy see; and he was impeached with having always favoured the French. But Giulian de Medici, the pope's brother, who had been kindly protected and entertained at the court of Urbino, had hitherto prevented the pope from dripping the duke of his dominions. The death of Giulian happening about this time at Florence, Leo, by the instigation of Lorenzo and his mother Alfonfina, drew up a charge of murder, rebellion, and other crimes, against the duke; and Lorenze, it the head of an army, composed of Florentines and the fibjects of the holy fee, took possession of Urbino, and Urbino afterwards of Pefaro; and, in four days time, of the whole attacked by duchy of Urbino, a few castles excepted, which were likewise the pope. foon after taken, the duke retiring to Mantua. Lorenzo, after a this, returned to Florence; and the pope, by a bull, to which . be obliged the cardinals to let their hands, conferred upon him the duchy of Urbing. The French king thought this to be N. C.

an infult upon himself; but, partly by the necessity of his affairs, and partly out of reverence to the pontificate, he put up with that and many other affronts offered him by the pope, whose difregard for him grew as the power and interest of his holiness with the European states increased.

Beginning and 270gress of Urbino.

THE duke of Urbino remained all this time in Mantas, and folicited the Spaniards to affift him in recovering his ducky. In this he was befriended by Frederic Gonzaga lord of Boxthe war of zolo, a man of high quality and reputation in military affairs, but a declared enemy to the house of Medici, on account of a personal affront he had suffered from Lorenzo. As Italy was then full of foldiers and officers of fortune, without employment, the duke was foon at the head of five thousand Spanish foot, the chief of whom was one Maldonato, a Spaniard, an officer of reputation. He likewise raised eight hundred light horse, commanded by officers of experience; but he was without money, artillery, or ammunition. He depended, however, greatly on the affections of his subjects, and fet out on his march for Urbino. The pope was alarmed at the prospect of encountering a desperate army that had nothing to lose; and, having treated the French king in a most infamous manner by deceiving him in all the agreements he had made with him, he concluded that Francis supported the duke. In this he was confirmed, by the duke's army being raised in the neighbourhood of that of France, under Lautre; and he had reason likewise to believe, that the duke was favoured by the Venetians, jealous of the greatness of a pope, who was, in effect, the fovereign of Florence. He, however, filled the Romagna with troops, under his nephew Lorenzo, part of them Florentines, and part belonging to the church, commanded by Renzo da Ceri and Vitello, who had orders to dispute the passage of the Po with the duke. They were, however, prevented by the rapidity of the enemy's march, who entered the Faventine, and appeared before Faenza, in hopes of raising some disturbances there in factor of young Manfredi, the representative of its late lords, who was in his army. In this the duke was disappointed; and he found the pope and Lorenzo so strong in the Romagna, that he could make no impression there. He therefore on a fudden marched towards his own capital of & bine, in which were two thousand Florentine soot, under Giacomo Rosetto, who being diffatisfied with the fervice, and finding the people all inclined to the duke, furrendered the place by edpitulition. The example of Urbino was followed by all the rest of the duchy, excepting the strong fortification of San Lee. The duke then attempted to take Fano, but misearried; while Lo-

Lorenzo and the Florentine army affembled at Rimini, and from thence moved to Pelaro, near which Lorenzo encamped, in a fituation that faced the duke's army. pope, however, ordered Lorenzo not to hazard a pitched battle if it could be avoided, for fear of endangering the Florentine flate, and because it was probable that the enemy, for want of money and provisions, would be obliged to retire. His holines, at the same time, filled all Europe with his briefs, complaining of the duke of Urbino's rebellion, as he called it, and demanding affiltance against him. Muximilian, and his grandson the king of Spain, afterwards the famous emperor Charles V. in order to improve the misunderstanding between the pontiff and the French king, sent him a body of auxiliaries; and even Francis, that he might not throw himself intirely into their arms, ordered Lautrec to march from Milan to his aid; but obliged his holiness to enter with him into a new treaty, and to do justice to the duke of Ferrara.

THE ecclefiastical and Florentine army was now very for-Mismamidable, amounting in the whole to near twenty thousand; nagement and Lerenze, who was personally brave, but had little expe- of the pope's rience in war, continued to face the duke's army, and fent generals. seven hundred light horse to scour the country of Vicariato, from whence the duke's troops drew their subsistence. While this was doing, one of the duke's officers, called Suarez, demanded from Lerenze a pass for himself, and another officer, whose name was to be inserted in it. The pass was accordingly granted, and the inserted name was that of Oratio da Fermo, the duke of Urbino's secretary. The two messengers being admitted into Lorenzo's presence, where Suarez produced a formal challenge from the duke to Lorenzo, offering Lorenzo to put an end to the calamities of the war, which fell so heavy challenged upon innocent subjects, either by fighting him hand to hand, by the duke or with an equal number on each fide. Lorenzo seemed to of Urbino. make no difficulty to accept of the challenge, provided the duke would give up all that he had taken. In the mean while he ordered both the officers to be put under arrest. His generals exclaimed against this breach of faith, and obliged him to release Suarez; but he put Oratio, on pretence of his being a native of the ecclesiastical state, to the rack, where he discovered the particulars of the correspondence carried on between the duke and the French king.

This challenge was ineffectual, but it carried with it an air of remantic bravery, and did vast service to the duke with Larenzo's officers of every nation. The truth is, though those officers were the best in Italy, yet his army was poorly commanded; and tho' weak, was vastly superior in numbers to the other, though composed of the best troops in Europe. The reasons were, because the pope was hated by all his auxiliaries for his diffimulation, and breaches of faith; and his officers ferved him for pay, and not out of affection. Every day produced some new demands, from the French especially, which the pope and Lorenzo were forced to comply with; and the different nations under them hated each other so much, that their orders were either disobeyed, or impersectly executed. The duke of Urbino still maintained his post, and drew his subsistence from the Vicariato, one of the most fertile spots in Italy. This obliged Lorenze to march towards Sorbolunge, which is five miles distant from Fossombrone. The dispositions for this march were so judicious, but so ill executed, that young Giovanni de Medici complained to Lorenzo of treachery amongst the officers. Lorenzo durst punish none, and religned himself entirely to the counsels of Renze and Vitella. The Florentine troops had been driven from Sorbolungo: and a resolution was taken to retire, under pretence of taking possession of Monte Baroccio. This motion had all the air of a flight, and the duke's troops harraffed those of the pope in their retreat. Lorenzo made no use of his superiority; and instead of forcing, as he might have done, his enemies to a battle, he kept upon the defensive, and suffered them to seize on all the strong passes, and particularly on Monte Baroccie, while the Florentine and papal army began to be straitened for provisions, having none but what they drew from Pelare.

com-

Insolence of

THE mutinies and mismanagement amongst Lorenzo's skeFrench troops at last quite exhausted the patience of his holiness, and he defired Lorenzo to do his utmost to prevail with the French to quit his service. The letters of his holiness for this purpose were intercepted by the duke of Urbino, who immediately fent them to the French quarters; and a dangerous mutiny must have ensued, had not Lorenzo, and Carbon the French general, pretended that they had been counterfeited by the enemy. Lorenzo then murched towards Fossombrone; but his troops exclaimed so much against Renzo and Vitello, that he at lat opened his eyes, and reproached them for having prevailed on him to protract the war for their own profit. He was now advancing to the Vicariato, where he took the castle of Mondolfo San Gojlanzo, and laid siege to Mondolfo, the strongest sortification in that district. But Lorenzo's artillery was so injudictiously disposed by Renzo, that they were soon dismounted, and a great number of the workmen and cannoneers killed. Lorenzo went in person to remedy this loss, but was dange-The place, however, was lo much shaken roufly wounded. by befreged, and Lorenzo rvounded, by springing a mine, that the garrison, discouraged at receiving no relief from the duke of Urbino, made terms for themselves, and marched out of the town, which surrendered to the pope's army.

WHILE Lorenzo lay ill of his wound, the pope sent the cardinal Santa Maria to take charge of the army. Upon his arrival, the small degree of discipline which still remained, vanished. The German and the Italian infantry quarrelled with each other, and many were killed on both fides, while the French seized that opportunity of plundering the tents and baggage of both. This tumult was with great difficulty suppressed; but it obliged the pope's generals to send the troops of different nations into different quarters, and Pefaro was affigned to the Florentines; while the French foot encamped half a mile's distance from the same city. A total but shameful inactivity for twenty days succeeded, which, together with a fecret intelligence carried on by the duke with the pope's army, encouraged him to quit his strong encampment at Monte Baroccio, and to beat up his quarters. Upon his arrival, he was joined by all the Spanish foot except eight hundred, who retired to Pefaro; and attacking the Germans, he killed and wounded above fix hundred of them, and forced the remainder to retire to the same city. As to the French, they got under arms, but remained quiet spectators of the whole.

THE duke then encamped between Urbino and Pelaro. The While he lay there, he entered into correspondence with one French Ambra, a Gascon officer, who hated Lautrec, and sormed a and Spaparty amongst the French and German foot for deserting to niards de-him, upon the pope's ministry resusing to comply with dube of their exorbitant demands. Being at little pains to difguise Urbino. their intention, Carbon and other general officers did all they could to prevail with them to return to their duty; but in vain; for no fooner did the duke's army appear, than Ambra put himself at the head of the mutineers, and, in order of battle, with fix field-pieces in his front, joined the duke, no more than thirteen hundred foot and seven officers remaining with Carbon. Next day, the Italian foot mutinied in like manner; and, lest they too should desert, it was found necellary to gratify their demands, which were as extravagant from the officers as the foldiers.

IT is observed by an excellent historian , that there was fomething very furprifing in the state of the two armies on this occasion. The pope's soldiers had no other object but money, with which they were supplied to prosusion; and yet they deserted to the duke of Urbino, who had none to give them. Under the pope's generals they had been mutinous and disobedient; but under the duke they lived in the greatest harmony, and submitted to the strictest discipling All this, according to the same historian, proceeded chiefly from the ardour and obstinacy of the troops. The papel legate and his generals were overwhelmed with consternation at so many repeated disgraces and losses; and, after many ineffectual confultations, they figned a paper, which they feet to the pope, advising him to restore the Bentivoglio family to Bologna. His holines not only rejected this counsel, but bitterly bewailed his own misfortune in having trufted to those who had given it.

GUICCIARDINI, book-vii.

THE duke of Urbine, at the same time, was not without his difficulties. His troops had received no pay for three months; and his duchy, as well as the Vicariato, were new exhausted of provisions and every thing else. He, therefore, with the approbation of his army, which chose plunder tather than pay, all of a sudden, pointed his march to the rich and fertile country of Tuscany. But he now discovered a plot for destroying him, or giving him up to the pope. Renze had against bim jokingly asked a Spanish prisoner when his countrymen were discovered to deliver the duke up. This incident, Seemingly slight as it was, being reported to the duke, gave him a deep fuspicion of Maldenato; and it soon appeared, by intercepted letters, that he, Suarez, and two other Spanish officers, had entered into a conspiracy against him; and that, the better to manage it, Suarez had suffered himself to be taken prisoner by Lorenzo. The duke disguised his knowledge of the affair, till he was possessed of proofs that made it unquestionables but he had no fooner entered the plains of Gebbie, in his march to Tuscany, than he drew up his army, and after hiranguing it in a most pathetic manner, and producing the evidences of the conspirators guilt, they were all four immediately put to death, with the approbation of all the troops THE duke then pursued his march towards Perugia, which Tuscany; was defended by Baglioni and Camillo Orfini, who commanded a party of Florentine men at arms, and two hundred and fift light horse. Upon the whole, therefore, the garrison was thought sufficient for the desence of the place. Lorenzo & Medici was now recovered of his wound; and after ordering Vitello to garrison Citta di Castello, he himself went to Florence, to put that capital, and the other towns of that flate, in a proper condition for receiving the enemy. When the duke appeared before Perugia, being destitute of battering cannon, he found himself unable to make any attempt upon it; but all of a sudden, Baglioni pretending that the Perugians could not bear to see their country destroyed, entered into a compromise with the duke; and upon the latter promising to quit the Perugian, paid him ten thousand ducats, and engaged not to carry arms against him during that war.

The duke diftreffed.

and puzifbed.

A plot

He invades

In the mean while the pope's legate, that he might oblige but returns the duke to evacuate Tuscamy, sell into the duchy of Urbino, to defend where, in three days time, he took and plundered Follom-Urbino. hrome, and laid siege to Pergola. Here he was joined by a fresh body of Spaniards, and he took the place by storm. Tho duke of Urbino, by this time, marched to Borgo San Sepolero; but understanding what danger his own state was in, he marched against the legate, and in a few hours drove him out of his duchy.

A PLOT was, at this time, discovered at Rome, sormed by Plot Alfonso cardinal of Sienna, son of Pandelse Petrucci, against against the the pope's life. His holiness lay under the greatest obligations pope. to the Retrucci family: but he had repaid it, by driving them out of Sienna. The cardinal being young and hot, at first had resolved to have killed the pope with his own hand; but he afterwards contracted with Vercelli, a Florentine surgeon, to poison him. Before Vercelli could be introduced about the pope's person, Assemble's impatience publicly hurried him into fuch invectives against the pope, that he was obliged to withdraw from Rome; but he left behind him his fecretary, with whom he held a correspondence, which, being secretly intercepted by the pope, gave him the first suspicion of the plot. Upon this he fent, by the Spanish ambassador, a pass, and his word of honour, for Alfonso's safety, if he would return to Rome, where the pope said he would give him satisfaction with regard to his affairs. Alfanfo was incautious Punilly enough to truft to his heliness; but he no looner appeared ment of the in the pope's presence, than he and his friend, cardinal Ban-conspiradinello, were put under arreft, and fent prisoners to the castle fors. of St. Augelo. Verrelli, at the same time, was sent prisoner from Florence; and after confesting all he knew, he was, with another accomplice, executed. The more the matter tras exquired into, the greater appearances there were of others being concerned. The cardinal of San Giergio, the chief of the college, was fent prisoner to the same castle, for not revealing the invectives which he had heard Alfonso throw out against the pope; and Lee called a consistory, in which the cardinals of Corneto and Volterra, on their knees, confessed their being guilty of the same crime. Soon after Alfonso was strangled in prison; but Bandinello was delivered from it on paying a large fum of money, though it was strongly suspected that a flow poison had been administered to him by the pope's orders. The other cardinals were treated with milder censures.

*. The antient Forum Sempronii.

Urbino,

THE success of the duke of Urbino in his own duchy, had invaded by brought fuch numbers to join him, that his army was now the dake of formidable. Instead of resuming his Tuscan expedition, he entered the marquifate of Ancona, where he laid Fabriano, and feveral other towns, under contribution, and took and plundered others, particularly Jesib. He then proceeded against Ancona itself, and obliged the inhabitants to pay him eight thousand ducats. After that, he belieged Osimo and Corinaldo; but miscarried before both, for want, not only of cannon, but ammunition. His bad success in not being able to take any one place that refused to pay him contribution-money, greatly diminished the reputation of his arms, and his loss of time was irretrievable. The ecclesiastical army, at this time, was commanded by the count of Potenza d, who took several places in Urbino; but was obliged to act on the defensive, till the arrival of fix thousand Swift, which his holiness had taken into his pay. The count lay at Pefare, which the duke endeavoured, but in vain, to take, and made an unfuccessful attempt to surprise the Swift auxiliaries, who were now advanced as far as Rimini.

aubo returns to

THE duke had now no other course lest but to resume his Tuscan expedition; and he accordingly entered that country, Tuscany. where, after resting some days, he besieged Anghiara, a town belonging to the Florentines, where, as usual, he was repulled for want of artillery. At last, he received four pieces of cannon; but, by this time, all the Tuscan cities and forts were filled with foldiers, and Lorenzo de Medici came from Florence to Borga, near which city the duke and his army were encamped. The country was unable to furnish the duke's troops with any more provisions; nor had they any prospect of plunder; nor could he advance them any pay; so that his fituation began to be very dangerous and uncomfortable, through the murmurs of his foldiers. Happily for him that of the pope was not much better. He had administered fresh cause of disobligation to the French King, and he had treated the Spanish ambassador very ill in the affair of the cardinal of Sienna. The duke of Urbino was a favourite with both those princes;

b The ancient Æfis. The ancient Auximum. ciently Potentia.

princes; and, by their orders, Moncada the viceroy of Sicily, and L'Escut the French general, had several times proposed terms of accommodation between him and the pope. conditions required by the duke appeared so unreasonable, that the viceroy, by his mafter's orders, came to the duke's camp, and persuaded his Spanish foot to insist with the duke upon a peace, which they were eafily brought to do; so that an accommodation was at last concluded on the following He is terms: that the pope should pay the Spanish infantry forty-forced to five thousand ducars, due, as they said, for four months ar- make peach tears; and to the Gascons, and the Germans united with them, fixty thousand ducats: that they should evacuate the state of the church, of the Florentines, and of Urbino, within eight days: that the duke should, within the said term, abandon all that he possessed, and be permitted to pass in safety to Mantua with all his artillery and effects. The pope, on his part, promised to absolve the duke from his censures, with all who had been engaged against him in the war of Urbino, natives and others.

As this treaty had been negociated and concluded only by and deferts commissioners, the duke refused to ratify it, when presented ed by his to him, unless a clause was inserted, importing, that the Spa- troops. niards had engaged to deliver to the pope the duchy of Urbino. The Spaniards thought that fuch a clause would be derogatory to their honour, and refused to admit the insertion, which produced high words between them and the duke. The duke perceiving that he was fold, to prevent his falling into the pope's hands, withdrew to the Piviero de Sestina with all the troops who were willing to follow him; while the Spaniards, receiving their money, marched back to Naples, as the other foot did to their several countries; so that the Italian soot, who had been omitted in the late bargain, alone remained with the duke, who, feeing himself now abandoned, was obliged to ratify the treaty that had been made in his name, and marched to Mantua, attended by no more than one hundred horse and six hundred soot. His retreat put an end to the war of Urbino, which cost the pope, during the eight months it lasted, eight hundred thousand ducats, the greatest part of which he had levied from the Florentines, over whom his power was, in a manner, despotic.

The finishing the war of Urbino restored peace to Italy. Leo des It is certain, that no bad man ever had so many amiable qua-scribed. Ities to recommend him as Leo had. No sooner had he the smallest respite from toil and danger, than he returned to the encouragement of literature and the fine arts, and he patronized them while involved in both. Florence now vied with Mod. Hist. Vot. XXXVI.

Rome in all that was great, magnificent, and elegant. This feems to have diverted the Florentines from all thoughts of re-afferting their liberties, and because they might be commanded by the dregs of the people. Machiavel their secretary, however, advised Leo still to keep up the forms of the constitution, so as that the people might be the less senfible that they had lost their freedom, and the government in general was mild and equitable. But many amongst the Florentines were too quick-fighted to be deceived with appearances, and all of them bewailed the vast expences into which they were brought by their dependence upon his holiness.

A crusade.

During this state of tranquillity in Italy, the Turks, under their emperor Selim, were making a progress in the east that alarmed all the christian powers. Nothing could have happened more fortunate than this did for the views of La. The revenues of Florence, and the ecclefiaftical state, went but a short way towards supplying his vast expences. By virtue of his pontifical authority, he made all Europe contribute towards them; but the most successful means he employed were his preaching up crusades against the Turks. The dispositions of many European powers, at this time, were uncommonly unanimous, and favourable for his defigns, and vast sums of money had been collected in France, the disposal of which was in the breast of his holiness. Francis knew this, and omitted nothing that could flatter either Marriage the pope's pride or his ambitic . A math was propoled of Loren, between Magdalena of the house of Bouillon, and cookquentiv of the blood-royal of France, and Lorenzo de Medici; and the propofal was highly encouraged by the Frank king, the apprehensions from the Turks being now blown over by the revolutions that had happened in their govern-The lady's fortune was ten thousand crowns a year, the greatest part of which was settled upon her by Francis; and all preliminaries being adjusted, Lorenze repaired to the court of France, where Francis received him with open arms, and gave him his kinfwoman in marriage.

20.

Friendship betrween Leo and

LORENZO overflowed in his expressions of grantude for this fignal honour, and devoted himself for ever to the king's fervice. But fomething more than words passed be-Francisco, tween them on this occasion. Lorenzo presented Francis with a bull from his holiness, impowering him to apply to his own use the money that had been raifed for the crusades; out of which Lorenzo himself received a present of fifty thousand crowns. The king, farther to testify his acknowledgment to the pope, put into Lorenzo's hands the brief of promile his holinels had made

1517.

1518.

1519

made for the restitution of Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, within seven months, which were now expired. This interview was followed by negotiations for peace all over Europe, for which the pontiff was extremely follicitous, nor did any thing extraordinary happen in Florence during the years 1517 and 1518, further than what we have related.

THE tranquillity of Europe, in the beginning of the year 1519, was broke by the death of the emperor Maximitian, a prince of a mixed character. He was inconstant, ex- Death of tfavagant, and though proud, contemptible for his perpe- the empetual indigence, that often run him into injustice and incon- ror Maxifistencies. Notwithstanding all this, he had great talents for milian. "government, was brave in his own person, and naturally humane. He had, before his death, laboured incessantly to procure for his grandson Charles, king of Spain, the succesfrom to the German empire; and vast sums had, for that purpose, been remitted out of Spain by Charles to his grandfather. Upon the death of Maximilian, the contest became more declared and ferious, and nothing was wanting to decide it, but the pope declaring himself for one of the candidates. Lee was averse to both, and dreaded the neighbour- Conduct of hood of both in Italy, where they were able, by their vast the pope in power, to make good all the imperial claims upon Rome, and the contest - the estates of the church. He was, however, obliged to for the temporize; but he could not long maintain his neutrality. empire. By an excessive refinement in politics, he declared for

- scale of a third candidate, who might be less formidable in Haly. In short, Lee sent Francis Orsmo as his legate into - Germany, to do Francis all the service he could; but with se-- eret orders to found the dispositions, and examine the inte-Tests of the electors. Leo followed out this scheme of con-<- duct with infinite address; but being afraid of an attack from Charles, who was equipping a fleet at Naples, Francis pordered his gallies, with four thousand land-troops on board, - to be in readiness to defend the sea coasts belonging to the Francis, whom he knew to be the weakest candidate; in *hopes of finding an opportunity, before the election came on, to make him fenfible of its being impossible he should "fireceed, and of perfuading him to throw his interest into the "church, and to the Florentines.

WHILE the election of an emperor was depending, Lo- Death of " renzo de Medici died. He lest by his wife, who died a few Lorenzo. days before in child-birth, an only daughter, Catherine, who  was afterwards fo infamous for her cruelty and diffimulation, married to Henry II. of France, and mother to three succeeding kings of that country. Upon the death of Lorenzo, Gg 2 smol.

Conduct

fome of Lev's counsellors were generous enough to suggest to his holiness, that he would give a noble proof of patriotism, now that all the male lawful descendants of the great Colmo were dead, but himself, if he would restore the Figrentines to their liberties. His holiness rejected this advice, swayed partly by partiality to his own family, though an illegitimate line, and partly by his hatred to a republic, from which he had been banishad. He therefore committed of the pape, the government of Florence to the cardinal De Medici; but restored the duchy of Urbino, and the cities of Pesaro and Senigaglia, which had been granted to Lorenzo, to the hely fee, though Lorenzo's daughter was in the investiture. He likewife demolished the walls of the city of Urbino, because of the attachment the inhabitants professed for their duke Francisco, and rendered Gobbio the capital of the duchy. As he owed immense sums to the Florentines, in order to preserve a shew of equity, he assigned them for payment the fortress of San Leo, and the district of Montefeltro, with the Pivier: de Sestina, which had before belonged to the Cesentine. Florentines, who hated the apostolic chamber, were far from being pleased with this manner of repaying their money, which threw upon them the trouble and expence of garrifoning and maintaining places that were entirely in the interest of duke Franci/co.

Charles cho, en emperar of

THE competition between Charles and Francis for the empire still continued; but the two rivals proceeded in very different manners. Irancis, sensible that the natural interest Germany, of Charles in Germany was superior to his, endeavoured to fupply that disadvantage, by sending immense sums from France to bribe the electors and their friends, so that he carried on an open traffic of corruption, which gave vast difgust to all the princes who had any sentiments of honour, virtue, or regard to the independency of their country. On the other hand, the Germans, in general, declared against placing any foreigner on the imperial throne; and even the Swifs supplicated the pope to favour the election of Charles. The contest turned out entirely in favour of the latter, who, under pretence of maintaining the liberties of the Germanic body, instead of squandering his money amongst the electors, employed it in raising an army, which advanced to the neighbourhood of Francfort, the place of the election. Notwithstanding all this, Les certainly would have carried his point, and both candidates must have been disappointed, had not the retormation every day gained ground in German, under Luther, who was patronized and protected by Frederic the Wife, elector of Saxony. It was to this prince that the · · · · · · electoral electoral college, foreseeing the calamities to which Germany must be exposed, offered the imperial crown, which he had many reasons for resusing; and he gave his vote for Charles, who was accordingly declared emperor. This preference shewn to Charles, exasperated Francis, who now pretended that he had received many grievances from the empire, and the house of Austria, and demanded redress of The pope thought this an excellent opportunity for attempting to make himself master of Ferrara, which had been long a favourite object with him. He committed the execution of the delign to the warlike bishop of Ventimigha, whom, without appearing to have any concern in the affair, he put at the head of two thousand troops; and had he been able to have passed the Po, he probably would have surprized the city. Though the pope, with the most solemn affeverations, disclaimed all knowledge of this attempt, yet he was not believed by the duke of Ferrarg, or any of the Italian princes.

In the same year 1520, his holiness, by his prothonotary, 1520, tampered with one Rodolfo, a captain in the duke's guards, The pope to give admittance to his troops, which were to be com-endea-manded by Guido Rangone, into one of the gates of Ferrara, yours to that lay at the end of a wooden bridge over the Po. Ran-become gone privately discovered this design, with all its circumstan-master of ces, to the duke, who soon defeated it, and punished Ro-Ferrara. dolfo for his treachery, but durst push the discovery no far-His failtings.

THOUGH there was scarcely a crime or vice, either perfonal or political, that Leo had not been guilty of, and tho? all Europe was fensible of the same; yet it is amazing how powerfully his pontifical dignity, joined to a certain complacency of manners, operated towards his preserving the respect and esteem of the christian princes. But Leo, notwithstanding all his policy, was the dupe of his own good nature, and by his boundless expences he had run himself into the most shameful necessities, which he was obliged to Supply by the most infamous means. He sent all over Europe, armies of dominicans, and other monks and friats, atzended by collectors, who kept open shop for the sale of indalgences. But the prodigious fums were levied by this scandalous traffic, the least share of the profit came to the pope, the rest being consumed amongst the collectors, or lavished upon his fister Madalena and her favourites. Every One knows in what manner those practices brought on the reformation, and how, in a few years, almost one-half of Eu-Tope was lost to the see of Rome, while the other half was Mayzered 1521. He is in great pro-Sperity.

staggered in its obedience. It is certain the pope gave himfelf very little trouble about affairs of religion, farther than as they served to replenish his coffers. All his cares tended to preserve the ballance of power in Italy, that he might maintain him elf in the possession of Florence, and the other Tuscan states, and the patrimony of the holy see, with the vast and unjust acquisitions that had been made to it by himfelf and his predecessor Julius. Italy had now enjoyed peace for three years, and the balance of power there, between the emperor and the French king, was in the hand of the pope; fo that being courted by all parties, his dominions, Florence especially, enjoyed happiness and wealth in the highest degree, while he indulged himself in every gratification, both of sensual and intellectual pleasure; to both which he was exquisitely formed by nature. He became at last latiated with those enjoyments, and once more turned his attention towards war. He could not bear the thoughts of having lost Parma and Piacenza to the church, and of his having been so often disappointed in his attempts upon Far-He was likewise asraid, that the emperor and the French king might accommodate matters between themselves, so as to depress his power and that of the church in Italy: he therefore resolved to make a league with one of those princes, and render him subservient in driving the other out of Italy; in which case he thought it would be easy to drive the conqueror out likewise. Before he determined which party to chuse, he dispatched into Swifferland, Antonio Pucci, bishop of Pistoia, to hire fix thousand Swifs, which the cantons readily confented to; and a free passage having been granted them through the state of Milan, they arrived in the Romagna, and the marquifate of Ancona, where they were quartered.

Makes preparations for war.

The public were amazed at the hiring and march of those troops in a time of profound tranquillity; and the pope at first pretended he had called them in to guard his own person. The truth was, that he had set on foot a secret treaty with the French king; by which the kingdom of Naples was to be attacked by their joint forces. Gaeta, and all the country between the Garigliano and the borders of the ecdessastical state, when conquered, were to belong to the church; as the rest of the kingdom was to go to the French king's second son, but under the tuition of an apostolical legate, residing at Naples, till the young prince should be of age. The king, on the other hand, engaged to assist the pontiff against the subjects and seudatories of the apostolical see, in which Ferrara was thought to be included. Separately from this convention, it was agreed between his holiness and the French king, that the latter should take the advantage of a rebellion which had just broke out in Spain, to seize upon the kingdom of Navarre, which he did. After that, the French invaded Spain itself; but this invasion turned to the disadvantage of Francis, because it reunited the Spaniards amongst themselves. The Swiss, however, now preserved the friendship of Francis to that of Charles.

Francis was examined in the council of France, the best pointed by heads there disapproved of it, as being too advantageous to Francis. France, and, therefore, containing some mystery to her prejudice; because the pope never could be supposed to see the duchy of Milan, and the kingdom of Naples, under the same head. Those, and many other reasons, most of which turned upon the pope's known diffimulation and double dealing, prevailed on Francis not to ratify the treaty. This irritated the pontiff, and the more, as Lautree the French governor of the Milancle refused to admit any of his bulls or monitories into that duchy. The pope, therefore, for felfdefence, offered his friendship and alliance to Charles, who readily accepted of both, as the friendship of his holiness was then of the utmost consequence to his affairs. A league was concluded between them for their mutual defence; and in it was comprehended the house of Medici, and the state of Florence g. In the same league there was an offensive ar- His league ticle, by which the Milanese was to be attacked, and Parma with the and Piacenza restored to the church; but, that the Milanese emperor. Mould return to Francisco Storza; to whom it was to be guarantied by both contracting parties. Charles was likewife to assist his holiness in the conquest of Ferrara; to pay an additional tribute for the kingdom of Naples, and it was to be deemed a fief of the empire.

WHEN the late concluded treaty between the pope and Difap-

Before the main purposes of this league was to be The Micarried into execution, the contracting parties determined lanese into make an attempt on Milan and Genea, both of them now waded. belonging to France, by the exiles of those two states. For this purpose, the historian Guicciardini, who was governor of Modena and Reggio for the pope, received ten thousand crowns from his holiness, which he paid to Morane, one of the Mi-to give the cardinal De Medici a pension of ten thousand ducats. Alexander de Medici, a natural son of the deceased Lorenzo, was likewise to receive an estate of ten thousand ducats a year in the kingdom of Naples. As to the Milanese, lancse exiles. Both those attempts, however, failed through causes that are foreign to this history; as did several other attempts of the same nature, which had been formed underhand by his helinefs. He was now obliged to throw off the mask; and he appointed Irideric, marquis of Mantua, general of the ecclefiaffical and Florentine armies, who were to march directly into Lombardy, and to attack the Milanela. The army under the marquis, was to be joined by all the men or arms which Charles had in Naples; by fix thousand Italian foot, two thousand Spanish foot, and two thousand others, under the marquis of Pescara; four thousand German foot, and two thousand Grifins, were likewise to be taken into the pay of the confederates. As to the Swifs that were in the pope's pay, four thousand out of the fix had returned into their own country, on account of their harvest, after coffing his holine's one hundred and fifty thousand crowns to no purpose. The other two thousand were continued in the pay of the confederacy, or, as it was called, the holy league; and his holiness applied to the cantons for leave to raise six shouland more. Upon the whole, therefore, the preparations for the invasion of the Milanese were very formidable, and it was resolved to attack that duchy on the fide towards Como, where the French government was very unpopular.

Lautree was, at this time, at the French court, and was with with difficulty prevailed on, through the force of great promiles, to return to Milan. The Venetians offered to join the French with fix hundred men at arms, and fix thousand foot; and the Swifs cantons, notwithstanding all their engagements with the pope, consented that the French king should take ten shouland of their fubiects into his pay. All this while, Francis omitted nothing that could mollify the pope, and break his confederacy with Charles. Lautrec being thus enabled to provide for the defence of the Milanele, the campaign opened greatly to the disadvantage of the holy league. It must be consessed, there is something very unaccountable in the nature of the command which it was under, and can be only ascribed to the jealousy the pope entertained of his generals. Guicciardini h informs us, that the marquis of Mantua was appointed captain-general of all the forces of the church; but that Prospero Colonna, though command. Without any title, had the command of the whole army. Thus there was, it feems, a real and a nominal command. Guicciardini, however, informs us, that he himself controuled both those generals, by virtue of his commission of commissary-general of the whole army, which gave him extraordinary powers. From all this we may conclude, that the marquis had obtained his high rank, on account of the convenient situation of his dominions, and the force which he brought to the field; but that the pope trusted to the abilities of Colenna for the operations of the campaign, and to Guicciardini, who was himself a Florentine, for being a check upon both.

Absurd distribusion of

6. 4

His holiness shewed himself no great general by such a Progress partition of command; especially, considering the compli- of the arcated interests of the league, and the nature of the Spaniards, my of the Sunis, and Germans, who were parties in it. The want of league. a due subordination among the chief officers soon appeared by its effects. Prospero Colonna, having garrisoned Modena, Bologna, Ravenna, and Imola, encamped upon the Lenza, within five miles of Parma, when he heard that four thousand Swift foot was arrived at Milan. Parma, itself, had a strong garrison, under L'Escut, brother to Lautrec; and both the Venetians and the duke of Ferrara were in motion, in favour of the French. At last Coionna, who was a found, tho' a slow, general, was joined by the marquis of Mantua; and by four hundred Spanish lances, under Antonio de Leva, who became afterwards fo famous in war. This enabled Colonna to advance to San Lazaro, within a mile of Parma; where he waited for a farther reinforcement from Naples, of three hundred lances, and two thousand Spanish foot, under the marquis of Pescarà, and for the German infantry, who were advanced as far as Eplurg. Colonna's great dependence was upon those horse to make head against the Swiss in the French army. The Venetians, however, made dispositions for opposing their progress; and the Germans began to shew themselves uneasy for their pay, which it was dangerous for the pope, out of whole purse it was to come, to send through the Venetian territories to Trent, where the Germans infifted upon receiving it. At last the marquis of Mantua, who, upon the whole, behaved with great honour and reputation, and the marquis of Pefcara, made some movements in the Mantuan, to favour the approach of the Germans; but the Venetians, whom Colonna knew not to be in earnest, retired *O Verona, and an entire junction of all the troops, belong-Ing to the army of the holy league, was effected.

A council of war being held, the fiege of Parma was pro- The fiege poled, but rejected; and it was unanimously agreed to march of Parma against Piacenza, which was but weak, and weakly garri- proposed fined, and lay convenient for favouring an attack upon and reject-Milan. While dispositions were making for that purpose, ed;

which promised to produce decisive effects in favour of the league, a few French horse having passed the Po, a report was foread of the approach of the whole French army: Giovanni de Medici was sent out to reconnoitre, and soon dik overed the mistake, and that the French army had repassed the river. The falle alarm, however, had occasioned the design against Piacenza to be laid aside; nor, through the disagreement of the generals of different nations, was it ever refumed. Their animofities even proceeded so far, as to create a kind of total inaction in the army; till the Florentine commissary, as he acquaints us himself, in behalf of his mailer the pope, spirited them up so effectually, that, by a kind of a fudden impulse, they resolved at once upon the fiege of Parma; a proposal which they had before unanimonfly rejected. But the execution received fome delay, because the heavy artillery was not yet come up, Colonna not having thought it necessary against Piacenza. was of vast service to Lautree, as it gave time for his auxiliaries to join him. The fiege of Parma was at last formed, but aukwardly carried on; and, as it appeared afterwards, the attack was made from the wrong post. Lautrec, by this time, having received the greatest part of his reinforcements, advanced to raise the siege of Parma, which was at last in great danger; that part of the town called Codiponte being taken by the besiegers. Lautree not being joined, as he expected, by fix thousand more Swifs, who were on their march, found himself too weak to fight the army of the league; but he encouraged his brother to hold out, as he would remain in the neighbourhood, and be perpetually besting up the quarters of the enemy. L'Escut, however, must have been obliged, either to have furrendered the place up by capitulation, or to have marched out with the garrison, and join his brother, had not the soldiers of the league plundered the inhabitants of that part of Parma they had taken, tho' they appeared rejoiced at returning to the obedience of the church; and this confirmed the Parmesans in the interest of the French. Advice in the mean time came, that the duke of Ferrara had surprized Finale and San Felice, and was advancing against Modena; which was, it seems, but ill prepared for a defence, through the caution of Coloma, who was unwilling to weaken his army.

This intelligence occasioned a meeting of the general officers of the league; where, after discoursing, rather than reasoning among themselves, it was unaccountably resolved to raise the siege of Parma, though it was known to be now at and shamethe last extremity. All the general officers were of this opi-fully abannion; but the brave and wife Antonio de Leva, though he doned. concurred with them in opinion as to raifing the fiege, added, that he hoped they would do it only to fight Lautrec; and if they beat him. Parma must fall of course into their hands. This counsel was rejected upon various pretexts. resolution, however, was of such moment, and carried with it fuch an appearance of disgrace, that before it was put into execution, Colonna, and the marquis of Pescara, consulted Guicciardini, the commissary, concerning it. Guicciardini reproached them with the inconsistency and pusillanimity of their conduct, and threatened them with the indignation of the The two generals replied, that the fiege could not, confistently with the rules of war, be continued; and that dispositions were making for instantly drawing off the artillery; nor durst the commissary longer oppose their joint authority. This shameful conduct, however, was no sooner known in the camp, than the foldiers openly expressed their diflike of it; and Guicciardini, with Morone, a Milanese exile, went to Colonna's quarters, where they found him very candidly disposed to reconsider the resolution, and, if he saw reason, to retract it. For this purpose, he summoned afresh the same council of war; but the marquis of Pescara, who had begun to draw off the artillery, refused to affist at it, as deeming it dishonourable to alter his opinion: thus the council broke up, and the resolution of abandoning the fiege was immediately executed, after remaining twelve days before the place.

List re-

So pufillanimous a proceeding rendered the officers, to Grief of whom it was owing, so despicable in the eyes of the Germans, the pope, that while the army was returning to their camp at San Lazaro, they mutinied, displaced their officers, and chose others in their room, because their exorbitant demands for pay were not complied with, and withdrew from the army of the league. The news of fo many difastrous and difgrace-· ful events overwhelmed the pope with grief and indignation; and the more, because, when they happened, he every moment expected to hear that he was master of Parma. He suspected the German and Spanish generals of treachery. Guicciardini, who was present all the time, seems inclinable to believe, that the whole was owing to the false intelligence - they received, which magnified the French army far beyond the truth; and to the caution of Colonna, who imagining a battle to be inevitable, thought that his foldiers could not be brought to it, if loaded with the spoils of Parma. certain certain that the French, who under Lautree were in very bid order, and could not bring the Stuifs to act, were amazed when they heard that the flege of Parma was abandoned: but that event not only gave them spirits and courage, but animated the Suis to their duty; and they now joined Lautree in great numbers. The news of this determined the generals of the largue to remove from Sun Lazare towards Reggio; and this retreat would have been converted into a dows wright hight, had not the Florentine and imperial commissaries remonstrated upon the d sgrace attending it. Some part of the home was laid upon Profess's too great caution, which reflicated him from employing a fufficient number of light horse to four the country, and get intelligence of the enemy's motions.

mebo recowers bis spirits.

LAUTREC's firength was better known at Rome than in the camp of the holy league; and the pope refuming his courage, brought the emperor to confent to march, with their whole force, against Milan itself; without regarding Parma, or any other object. With this view the pope had taken into his pay, but not without great opposition, a fresh body of twelve thousand Swifs. But the cantons hired them out on the express condition, of their being employed only in defence of the church's patrimony, and their not ferving against the French. The cardinal of Sion, however, and the other agents for the holy league, accepted of them, even on that condition; as knowing it would not be difficult to prevail upon them, after descending into Italy, to serve against Lombar- Milan. After various consultations, the generals of the dy attack-league despairing to take Parma, too weak to face Lautre's ed with all camp, and unable, for want of sublishence, to continue the force of the league,

where they were, refolved to pass the Po. While dispositions were making for that, count Guido Rangone, by the pope's orders, supported by a body of Tuscan foot, reduced an important pass, called the mountain of Modena, belonging to the duke of Ferrara.

AT this time, the army of the league was peffered by a fet of handitti, who, under the denomination of Milanese exiles, plundered wherever they came, and even intercepted the convoys coming to their own army. Colonna, however, at last, made dispositions for passing the Po; but sailed in an attempt, that was to have been executed by Giovanni de Medici, for burning the French boots on that river, near Cremona. But it was necessary to take case of the towns belonging to the church, and its allies, before the army passed the Po-Fiteli, therefore, was ordered to garrifon them with one hundred and fifty men at arms, as many light horse, and two thouland thersand soot, all of them Florentines, or paid by the money of that state; and two thousand Swiss, whom it was not thought safe to employ against the French, were detached upon the same service, under the bishop of Pisson. Thus Modena, Reggio, and other towns in the eccleiastical jurisdiction, were secured against the insults of the duke of Ferrara; who boasted of having been the deliverer of Parma, and whom the pope, as far as ecclesiastical censures could do it, had now deprived of his duchy of Ferrara.

In was the first of Ostober, 1521, before the army of the 1521. league, which was prodigiously encumbered with baggage, which and useless attendants, passed the Po. This passage was ef-passed the fected in to slovenly and dilatory a manner, that had Lautree Po. attacked one party, while the other was passing, he might have defeated the whole. They encamped at last at Casal Maggiore, where a new scene of dissimulation was opened.

THE French king, who knew the pope was the foul of the league against him, had, from the commencement of hostilities in Lembardy, tempted him with the most specious offers to dissolve the confederacy. Les, at first, resisted him with great firmness; but perceiving that the whole weight of the war rested upon himself; that Charles was unable, or unwilling, to advance money; that no dependence was to be had upon the German and Spanish officers; and that the service of the Swifs was clogged with conditions, he began at last to harbour thoughts of an accommodation. Upon the raising the siege of Parma, he wrote a letter, with his own hand, to cardinal de Medici, his substitute at Florence, to repair immediately to the camp of the league, with the authority of apostolical legate, to prevent the bad consequences of the dispute between Colonna and the marquis of Pelcara. The cardinal did not arrive at the army till it was Cardinal encamped at Cafal Maggiore; nor had the pope yet deter- de Medici mined to yield to the importunities of the French king, but arrives in The cardinal was the second person in the camp. to wait for events. the ecclefiaffical state; and though he resided at Fiorence, nothing was done at Rome without his advice and approbation, fo that even his prefence was thought sufficient to overawe all differences. The army of the league moved in four divisions through the Gremonese towards the Oglio. In this march a quarrel happened between the Spanish and Florenzine foot, in which some were killed on both sides; but it? was foon terminated by the interpolition of the general officers: and Giovanni de Medici routed a party of l'enetien and French horse, who had passed the Po, near Cremona. While the army of the league was encamped on the banks of the Oglio.

the army

of the league,

Oplio, a refolution was taken to march to Bordellano. The badness of the roads obliged them to halt half-way, at a place called Rebecca, where they received undoubted intelligence, that Lautree, at the head of the French and Venetian armies, was within five miles, with a delign to fight Danger of them if they should proceed. This intelligence was the more alarming, as the pope and the cardinal had received assurances from the Venetians, that they would be inactive. There was no comparison in the force of the two armies; that of Lautree confishing of a strong body of excellent cavalry, feven thousand French and Italian foot, and ten thousand The army of the league, on the other hand, was, from various causes, so much reduced, that it did not contain above seven thousand Germans and Spaniards, and about fix thousand Florentines and other Italians, many of whom were new levies. After confultation, it was refolved to intrench themselves at Rebecca, and wait for a great reinforcement of Swifs, under the cardinal of Sion, who was upon his march, and promised to join the troops of the league in three or four days at farthest. This fituation, however, was very disagreeable. Their camp was exposed to the artillery of Porto Vico, a Venetian town on the opposite banks of the river, and the difficulties of getting provisions every day in-But the cardinal had still a notion, that the Venetians were not in earnest, and gave himself little trouble with regard to them. The other inconveniency was more difficult to be remedied; because the disorders of the soldiers, the Milanese exiles particularly, had been so great, that the perfants could not be prevailed upon to bring provisions into the camp. Guicciardini's opinion was, that the army should remove to the borders of the Mantuan, where they were fure of provisions. But this looked so like a retreat, and a repetion of their disgrace at Parma, that the advice was rejected. The army continued at Rebecca, but under fuch diffress for want of bread, though there was plenty of flesh and wine, that many of the Florentines, and other Italian foot, de-aubich escapes. ferted.

AFTER the army had lain for three days in this uncomfortable fituation, Lautrec, who had taken post at Bordelland, fent part of his artillery across the Oglio to Porto Vico, from whence it played upon the camp of the league. This, happening contrary to the expectation of the cardinal and the general officers, threw the army into fuch diforder, that before break of day they broke up, without found of drum or trumpet; and, as Guicciardini had advised them, they marched to Gubbioneta, a town within five miles of the borders of the Mantuan, where they took up a very strong camp. It is generally acknowledged, that Lautree was guilty, on this occasion, of an unpardonable omission, in rejecting the advice of his Swift officers, which was, that at the same time he fent his artillery to Porto Vico, he should have marched against the enemy; who being then between two fires, must either have furrendered, or have been destroyed. The obstinacy of Lautrec, who was naturally felf-fufficient, in rejecting this advice, ruined his master's affairs. He took up the camp of his enemies at Rebecca, but proceeded no The generals of the league, however, perceiving they could not continue at Gabbieneta, because of its damp unwholesome situation, and being apprehensive of the stren, th of the French, carried their troops over the Ogio, and encamped at Ostiano, where it was resolved to remain till they were joined by the Swifs, whose march was unaccountably retarded.

WHILE the two armies continued in this inactivity, the Conduct of bishops of Pistoia and Vitelli, at the head of the Swiss and the Swiss, Flarentines they commanded, forced the duke of Ferrara's entrenchments, which were very strong, at Finale, and routed his army. This obliged the duke to retire to Ferrara, and remove the bridge of boats he had laid over the river, to prevent his being pursued. The Swifs, in the pope's pay, by this time, had entered the territory of Beramo; but notwithstanding the most earnest instances of the cardinal of Sion to the contrary, they discovered an invincible reluctance to fight against the French king. They offered, however, to march against Parma and Piacenza; because, as they said, they of right belonged to the church. Their scruples, however, were at last surmounted, and proceeding on their march. they defeated several parties of the French and Venetians, and encamped near the army of the league. But their scruples again returned, and four thousand of the troops raised in the canton of Zurich, refused to join the army of the league. All the arts and promises of the cardinals de Medici and Sion. and the archbishop of Capua, could not conquer their obstinacy, and they separated from their countrymen. Notwithstanding this, the two cardinals refolved to proceed with the fix thousand remaining, and they put themselves in the centre of the army; which, fays Guicciardini, was composed of blasphemous robbers and murderers, preceded by filver croffes, and other pompous badges of ecclefiastical authority; "So great, says the same author, who was on the spot in "our times is the abuse of the reverence due to religion.

THE two cardinals made necessity their excuse for their marching through the Venetian territories for three days; which was the same excuse that senate had urged for their general Gritti having suffered the French to send their anil-Tery to Porto Vico. Being arrived at Orci Vecchi, orders amived from the Swiss cantons, commanding all their subjects to separate from both armies. The politic cardinals found means to keep back those orders from their Swifs; but those in the French pay receiving theirs, they instantly separated the French from Lautrec, who had not been in a condition to pay them for some months; because his remittances had been intercepted by the French king's mother, and her creatures, and converted to their own use.

rete from

The army of the league passes the Adda,

THE army of the league having left Orci Vecchi, arrived at Rivolta; while Lautrec, after the departure of the Swift; was obliged to act on the defensive, and made dispositions for disputing the passage of the Adda at Cassimo, which lies opposite to Rivolta. Thus the fortune of war all of a sudden changed; and the towns of the Ghiradadda being abandoned by the French, supplied the army of the league with plenty of provisions. The differences between Colonna and the marquis of Pescara still continued; and the sormer, without communicating his defigns to the latter, fent over some companies of Florentine soot, in two barks, to surprise the town of Vauri, which lies on the Adda, seven miles from This place contained a rude fortification, which it was easy to render desensible; and Peppoli, an officer in the French pay, lay there with a few foot. Prospero's design succeeded, and the first embarkation landed. Peppoli perceiving the place surprised, dispatched a messenger to Lautree for a reinforcement of cavalry; and, in the mean time, made all the resistance he could against the Italians who had landed. According to Paulus Jovius, when the messenger arrived at Cassano, Lautrec was asleep; and his servants not daring to disturb him, he did not receive the message till it was too later and then he ordered his brother L'Escut, to set out with a detachment of horse to support Peppoli. By this time the cardinal de Medici and Colonna, who had artfully quartered his foot in the village opposite to Vauri, and who, according to order, moved with great expedition towards the river, had left Rivolta, and were arrived at the place of embarkation, where they used their utmost endeavours to forward the passage; while Giovanni de Medici, on a Turkish horse, to the amazement and terror of all who faw him, plunging into the river, fwam to the opposite shore.

By this time L'Escut was arrived at Vauri, with four hundred men at arms, and a body of foot, and vigoroully attacked the place where the Italians, who had passed the river, had entrenched themselves; but his artillery not coming up in time, he was obliged to retire to Cassano; and Lautree, despairing now to desend the river, retired from thence with his whole army towards Milan. This passage of the Adda, in the face of so celebrated a general as Lautrec, retrieved the reputation of Colonna, and in those days was looked upon as a master-piece in the art of war. He, perhaps, thewed a greater proof of his military genius, when, instead of marching directly to Milan, he encamped at Marignano, which lies about half-way between Milan and Pavia; from which last place Lautree had drawn the garrison, to strengthen his own army. From Marignano, where he waited three days in expectation of his artillery, his Swift advanced to Chiaravalle; while Lautrec made the necessary dispositions for defending the castle, city, and suburbs of Milan. By this fituation, Colonna, and the generals of the league had it in their power, if repulsed at Milan, where all the inhabitants were disposed to receive them, to fall back to Pavia, where part of their light troops had already taken post. Every thing succeeded to their wish. The Spanish foot led the van of their army, and met with no opposition from the Venetians and the Swiss in their pay, who were posted in the suburbs of Milan, which the Spanish foot immediately took possession of. The marquis of Pescara then led his in- and refantry to the Roman gate of Milan, which, without refult-duces Miance, was opened to him; and the cardinal de Medici, Co-lan and lonna, and the marquis of Mantua, entered it, wondering at other

Thus the city of Milan was lost by the French, through the inexcusable negligence of Lautrec, who was deficient in intelligence, and trusted that the badness of the roads, in that advanced season, would have prevented the approaches of the enemy. Lautrec, however, was still more inexcusable, in not assembling his troops on the plain before the castle of Milan, which still held out with a numerous well provided garrison; and in not falling upon the troops of the league, who were in great disorder, after taking possession of the city: but the darkness of the night, in which all this happened, was pleaded as his excuse. He drew off his troops towards Como, where he left a garrison; and from thence he march-the easiness of so important a conquest.

ed into the territory of Bergamo.

LODI, Pavia, and Piacenza, followed the example of the city of Milan, by admitting the troops of the league; and Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI. H h Cremona Cremona would have done the same, had not Lautree thrown himself into it, and defeated the inhabitants, who had declared for the league. His success, which was unexpected by himself, was owing to the bishop of Piftoia's disobeying the orders of cardinal de Medici, in not sending a body of Swis to support the insurrection of the Cremonese against the French. Lautree had despaired of being able to recover Gremona, and had fent orders to Federigo da Bozzoli, who commanded in Parma, to abandon that city, which he did; but upon Lautrec's success at Cremona, a counter order was sent him, which came too late; for Vitelli was then in possession of Parma. The siege of Como was next undertaken by the marquis of Pescara. He took the place upon capitulation, which was basely violated; and, on that account, the French commandant challenged him to a fingle duel.

Pope Leo miaft of bis triumph.

In the mean while, pope Leo, being overwhelmed by the dies in the constant series of good news, which overcame his spirits, was, in the midst of success and pleasure, seized with a slow fever, on the 1st of December, at Magliano, one of his voluptuous retirements near Rome, to which city he was re-His physicians, at first, slighted his disorder; bu in a very few days it carried him to his grave. His cupbearer, Barnabo Malespina, was suspected of having poisoned him, and was therefore thrown into prison; from which he was delivered by the cardinal de Medici upon his arrival at Rome, and no farther enquiry was made into the matter. We shall say nothing farther in this place of Leo's character, which has been already described, but that he deceived all who knew him. While a cardinal, the public had a high opinion of his virtue, and a small one of his abilities; when a pope, it was perceived that he had great abilities, and no virtue. The time he held the pontificate, is termed the golden days of literature and the arts. When he died, he was within a few days of forty-eight years of age.

LEO's death created a total alteration in the affairs of Italy. It weakened the power of Charles in Lombardy, and strengthened the connexions between the Venetians and France, which the former were ready to have abandoned. The affairs of Charles on this side the Alps were embarrassed, fo that he could not improve the advantages which the army of the league had gained in Italy, where the French were still in possession of Cremona, Genoa, Alessandria, the castle of Milan, with the fortresses of Novara, Trezzo, Pizzigittoni, Domussola, and Arona, and all the Lago Maggiore. of Pontremonli was likewise recovered by the Genoese of his faction; but the great strength of the French now lay in the

difunion

distunion of their enemies. The cardinals of Sion and Medici abandoned all other considerations to attend the papal election, which the former expected to fall upon himself. Charles dismissed all the Swifs in his pay, excepting fifteen hundred; and he likewise disbanded his German soot. The Florentine troops marched back to their own country, while those of the church were partly quartered in Modena, and. partly in the Milanese; of which Lautree complained to the college of cardinals: but they were so divided amongst themfelves, that they referred him for redress to the future pope. In the mean while the duke of Ferrara drew his troops into the field, and, with little or no loss, recovered Bondino, Finale, the mountain of Modena, the Carfagnano, Lugo, Bagnacavello, and the other towns in the Romagna, and threatened to lay siege to Cente. Parma was at this time in a dangerous fituation. Its Guicciarbreaches had not been repaired fince the late fiege; the in-dini dehabitants were unarmed and dispirited, and its garrison mu-fends tinous. Encouraged by these appearances, Lautrec, by the Parma, advice of Federigo da Bozzolo, formed a design to surprise it with fix hundred lances, and two thousand five hundred foot. drawn from Cremona, which was then his head-quarters. Cardinal de Medici had foreseen that such an attempt would be made; and commissioned the historian Guicciardini to defend Parma. Guicciardini had, for some time, been governor of Modena and Reggio. An attempt had been made to prevail with the Swiss of the canton of Zurich, who remained still at Piacenza, to detach one thousand men for the defence of Parma; but they refused it, for fear of weakening themfelves. Guicciardini, therefore, was obliged to fend for arms from Reggio, which he put into the hands of the citizens; whom, with great difficulty, he persuaded to abandon that part of the town called Codiponte, as being untenable; and Bozzolo immediately took possession of it, with three thoufand foot, and some light horse, being followed by about the fame number of French and Venetian foot. It happened that the waters of the Po, at this time, had overflowed the country, so as to render the roads impassable for Lautrec's heavy artillery to come up. This was a great disappointment to Bozzolo, who conducted the enterprise; which chiefly depended on expedition for its success. His emissaries within the city made the people believe, that the heavy artillery was at hand; and it required all Guicciardini's art and address to keep them from furrendering. To increase his difficulties. the garrison mutinied for want of pay; but the affection of the city towards the church was fo great, that the inhabitants raised the money, and the mutiny was appealed. Guicciardini, Hh2 if we are to believe his own report, acted, on this occasion; the part both of a consummate politician and an able gene-To remove all suspicion of his having selfish views, he represented to the citizens, that he could have no interest in exposing himself to danger, but their safety and the good of the church; and that he was not certain, whether the fucceeding pope might not be an enemy both to him and his countrymen the Florentines. Notwithstanding all his arts. and the hopes he gave them of immediate relief, the citizem relapsing into their fears, came to a resolution of capitulating, and were on the point of fending out messengers to treat of it, when they faw the enemy approach the walls to enter the city by storm. Guicciardini, with great presence of mind, told the citizens that they had nothing to do but to fight, for it was now too late to capitulate; for while they were treating, the French would florm and plunder their city, and carry and faves them all into captivity. This speech had the defired effect.

French.

it from the All thoughts of a capitulation was laid aside. The garrifon ran to the walls, and the citizens observing with what ease the affailants were repulsed, bestirred themselves, so that the French were obliged to give over their enterprise with confiderable loss, and not without some disgrace, as Guiceiardini, who had conducted the defence, was not a man of the fword, but of the law.

THE duke of Urbino taking advantage of the vacancy of the pontificate, accompanied by Malatella and Oratio Baglioni, had drawn together a confiderable body of disbanded foldiers, who required no other pay than plunder, entered his dukedom; all which he recovered without fighting a stroke, excepting those places which, as we have already mentioned, had been given up by the late pope to the Flerentines, and was by them garrifoned. Their affections however towards the Medici family were much cooled by the death of Leo. Many amongst them could not bear that the cardinal, tho' illegitimate, should prefume to exercise the fame authority over them as the late pope had done; and his government over them had given them no idea of his virtue. But it was dangerous to oppose his authority, and the rather because he affected to be the sole desender of the church's patrimony during the vacancy of the holy see. Perugia being threatened by the duke of Urbino, he stretched all his credit with the Florentines, and at last prevailed upon them to undertake its defence. The truth is, the facred college was so divided amongst themselves, and the profusion of the late pope had fo exhausted the revenues of the holy see, that cardinal & Medici seemed, at this time, to have its interest at heart.

Medici was the only person of great authority in Italy, who

THE duke of Urbino and his confederates having encamped Perugia at a short distance from Perugia, made excursions all over lost by the that neighbourhood. The garrison consisted of two thou-Florenfand foot, and one hundred light horse, under Guido Vaina, tines. in the pay of the Florentines, five hundred foot in the pay of Gentile, who was lord of the place under the pope, and one hundred and twenty men of arms, and one hundred light horse, commanded by Vitello. On the fourth day of the new year 1522, the duke of Urbino, whose army was now encreased to five thousand foot, with a good body of horse, besides several pieces of field artillery lent him by the duke of Ferrara, got possession of San Piero, one of the suburbs of Perugia. He then attempted to take the place by storm; but though his affaults continued in different quarters almost a whole day, he was repulsed with considerable loss. Florentines on this flattered themselves that they should easily be able to defend the place against all the power of the asfailants; when Vitello, from private motives of his own, gave them notice that he was determined to leave it with all his troops, and did so, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the Florentine general to detain him. As Vitello, properly fpeaking, was general of the ecclefialtical troops, the Florentine general bad no pretext to oppose the return of the two brothers Baglioni, whose father had been put to death by the late pope. Gentile and the Florentines followed the example of Vitello, and while they withdrew through one gate, the Baglioni went out at the other.

The cardinals in the conclave were all this time disputing Adrian about the choice of a new pope. At first the cardinal de chosen Medici had great reason to hope the election would go in his pope. favour, though he was not then fifty years of age; but the revolt of Perugia, and the progress of the duke of Urbino, damped his hopes, and his great friend cardinal Petrucci, who was afraid that Sienna would follow the sate of Perugia, perfuaded him by all means to accelerate the election. This consideration, joined to that of the danger of Florence in such an event, determined the cardinal de Medici; and he agreed to the election of Adrian, cardinal of Tortosa, who was a Fleming by birth, and was then lieutenant governor of Spain under Charles, whose tutor he had been. The new pope received the news of his election in Spain, and taking the name of Adrian the sixth, he repaired directly to Italy.

THE apprehensions of danger to the Siennese was not ill Warinthe founded; for the duke of Urbino having likewise reduced To-Siennese.

Hh 3

di, marched directly against Sienna. The Siennese had no dependence but upon the Florentines for their defence, and the cardinal de Medici ordered the regency he had left in Flo. rence to fend Vaina, with one hundred light horse and some money, to the affistance of the Siennese. By the help of this money they were enabled to take into their pay one thousand Swiss that were under the bishop of Pistoia, and four hundred German foot. Giovanni de Medici was likewise called out of Lombardy with the troops he commanded. A great party amongst the Siennese opposed the admission of the Florentines into that city; and cardinal Petrucci being absent, a deputation was sent out to treat with the duke of Urbino concerning a furrender. While this treaty was in dependence, the Florentine troops entered Sienna, and the Swifs auxiliaries approached it; fo that the duke being in no condition to undertake a regular fiege, gave over the enterprise, and returned to his own duchy. Upon his retreat, the college of cardinals folicited the Florentines, and the Swifs who had been hired by Florentine money, to attempt the recovery of Perugia, which they agreed to, and the cardinal of Cortons, who was legate of Perugia, marched with them in person. But the maxims of the papal court were now changed; and the cardinals who had the management at Rome exclaimed against the cardinal de Medici and the Florentines, for disturbing the peace of the ecclesiastical state; because some disorders had been committed by the Florentine troops during their marches and countermarches. When the Florentines arrived before Sienna, they found it strongly garrisoned by the Baglioni; and therefore, under pretence of complying with the will of the cardinals, they turned towards Montefeltro. Here they had no farther object for their arms. The regency of cardinals at Rome had agreed that the duke of Urbino should keep possession of his duchy till the new pope arrived in Italy, provided he did not molest the Florentines, which he was in no condition to do; fo that there was a tacit cessation of arms on both sides.

Sforza dake of Milan.

During those transactions in Tuscany, Francesco Sforza, received as who, in right of blood, was the true duke of Milan, was received into that capital where Colonna commanded; and Lautree formed the fiege of Pavia, which Colonna obliged him to abandon. The Swiss in Lautrec's army demanded their arrears; but he had no money to pay them; upon which they prepared to fet out for their own country: but to show that they were willing to do their duty, they defired to be led to the enemy next day, that they might fet out on their return the day after. Lautree took them at their word, and led them against the army of the league under Colonna, which was posted at Bicocca, within strong ditches and entrenchments. The Swift made a most furious attack; but were repulsed with the loss of three thousand men, and Co-Jonna declined molesting them in their retreat. Next day Lautree broke up his camp, and marched to Cremona, while the Swift in his army returned to their own country. Upon his retreat, the army of the league facked Lodi, and befieged Cremona, the city of which was given up by L'E/cut the governor (his brother Lautree being returned to France) who agreed that the French should evacuate all the Milanese, excepting the castles of Milan, Cremona, and Novara. After those great acquisitions, the army of the league marched, and took and plundered Genoa by the affistance of the Florentine artillery; fo that the French were now in a manner expelled out of Italy.

CARDINAL de Medici was all this while extremely uneasy, The cardisuspecting that the new pope, who was not yet arrived in nal de Italy, would strip him of his greatness in Florence. He had Medici privately excited the Bentivoglio family to make a fresh at-retires to tempt upon Bologna, which did not succeed; and endea-Florence. voured to create such distractions in the ecclesiastical state, as might make it necessary for the new pope to employ and trust him. The French king was sensible how much he had been hurt by the Florentines being under the direction of the pope during the late war, and he formed a scheme for setting up the cardinal of Volterra, and the Soderini family, in oppofition to that of Medici, and committed the execution of it to Renze, whom we have already mentioned. This design coming to the ears of the cardinal de Medici, who underflanding that Renzo was raising men with the money he had received from the cardinal of Volterra, came to an accommodation with the duke of Urbino, and brought the Florentines to agree that he should command their forces from September following for one year certain, and for another even-The Florentines, at the same time, took into their pay Oratio Baglioni, and would have engaged his brother Malatesta likewise, both of them being then in the service of the Venetians; but the latter declined the engagement, because he had already taken money from Renzo. Being unwilling however to exasperate the Florentines, he seigned an indisposition, to excuse himself from serving against them in person, and promised to the cardinal de Medici that he would enter into Florentine pay as foon as he could do it with ho-But Renzo by this time was at the head of five hundred horse and seven thousand foot, and made a sudden ir-Hh4 noitaur

War in the ruption into the Siennese, in hopes of marching to the gates of Florence. On this emergency the Fiorentines appointed Guicontinues. do Rangone to the command of their army, which they ordered to march directly to the Siemuse against Renze. gone's instructions were to harrass and amuse the enemy as much as possible, and to avail himself of the situation of the country and Renze's want of artillery; and above all things to cover the fortified towns belonging to the republic. Ren-22's first attempt was upon Chivst, where he miscarried for want of artillery; as he did in an attack upon the caffle of Torrita, which was provided by Rangone with a good garrison. He then directed his march to Sienna where Pitieliano was the Florentine governor; but Rangone, who had excellent intelligence, leaving his main army to follow him, threw himself into the town with two hundred light horse; so that Renzo durst not venture to assault it. He had loss a great deal of his reputation with the most fanguine of his own party; and being now in want of both money and provisions, he drew off from Sienna to Aquapendente, a town in the pope's dominions, where he thought himself secure from the pursuit of the Florentines. His supplies of money from the cardinal of Volterra, and that party, now failing him, he plundered the sea-coast of the Siennese territory, and asfaulted Orbitello; but having left the few artillery he had behind him, in his retreat from Sienna, he was repulsed. The Florentine army was now advanced to the bridge of Contina, which divides the Siennese from the ecclesiastical territory, and fent a message to the college of cardinals, informing them, that unless Renzo was obliged to lay down his arms, they would enter the dominions of the church. The college upon this interposed, to the great satisfaction of both parties, who gave fecurity that neither should molest the other, and agreed to refer all differences between them to the pope upon his arrival in Italy.

Malatefla mini.

THE cardinal de Medici continued all this time to labour rizes Ri- for the tranquillity of the ecclesiastical dominions; but Pandolfo Malatesta, the representative of the ancient lords of Rimini, seized that city. The cardinal was deputed by the college to go to Bologna as legate, and if he could not recover Rimini in the way of negotiation, he was promised that the marquis of Mantua, as general of the pope's dominions, should support them with an army. This commission however was imposed upon the cardinal by his enemies, for no part of those promises was fulfilled; and the affairs of the ecclesiastical state, notwithstanding all his zeal, remained in as great disorder as ever.

A new convention was then proposed to be entered into by Rrogress the parties in the holy league for maintaining the tranquillity of the imof Italy, which was again threatened by the French king, perialifts now at peace, and powerful within his own dominions. The in Italy. imperial army in the Milanese had no money, and its generals were unable to procure any subsistence for it in that exhausted country; and therefore, without any cercmony, they quartered them in the ecclefiastical state; but money being still wanting, don Carlos de Lanajo, the viceroy of Naples, fettled the quotas of a contribution that was to be advanced by the states of Tuscany for their maintenance; of which the Florentines were to pay fifteen thousand ducate, the Genzese eight thousand, Sienna five thousand, and Lucca four thousand. Though those exactions were little better than robberies; yet such was their dread of the imperial power, now greatly encreased by the accession of the new pope who arrived in Rome the twenty-ninth of August, that none durst refuse to pay it. The imperial interest was now every where prevalent in Italy. Henry VIII. king of England was in his interest; and not only lent him money, but threatened to declare war against Francis if he did not agree to a truce with Charles for three years, in which the dominions of the church, Sforza duke of Milan, and the Florentines, should be comprehended. Francis looking upon this proposal as a renunciation of his right to the duchy of Milan. rejected it, and made preparations for a fresh descent into Italy.

THE system adopted by the new pope was to unite all the System of states of Italy, especially the Florentines, in one common the pope cause against the French; and the emperor had the same views. The Florentines complained that Charles had not, according to his promise to pope Leo, given in writing soon after his election, confirmed to them their privileges and possessions. But Giovanni Manuel, ambassador from Charles at Rome, to make them easy on that head, promised that his master should punctually suffill his engagements; which he accordingly did the month following.

In the beginning of the year 1523, Malatesta, through the 1524, interposition of the duke of Urbino, restored Rimini to the Rimini holy see; and his holiness, in consideration of his former ser-recovered vices to pope Julius, not only absolved him from all eccle-by the staffical censures, but confirmed him in his possession of the staffic duchy of Urbino, but with a saving clause to the claim which the Florentines had upon Monteseltro; for which they said they had lent pope Les three hundred and sifty thousand ducats, besides sixty thousand they had expended since his death.

To leave no

death, in defence of the church's patrimony.

power in Italy disaffected, his holiness in like manner reinvested the duke of Ferrara, not only in all the estates he held before his variance with Leo, but in the castles of San Felice and Finale, and even gave him hopes of restoring to him Modena and Reggio. The duke, on his part, promifed an entire submission to the holy see, and to assist in its prefervation with a certain number of troops. About this time the castle of Milan surrendered to the imperialists; and farrenders Charles, who valued himself greatly upon his good faith, gave the investiture of it to Sforza. It was no surprize to the world, that pope Adrian, notwithstanding his professions of peace and difinterestedness, affisted a pupil who had placed him on the pontifical throne. He laboured with indefategable pains to detach the Venetians from the interests of France, and to bring them to act offensively in favour of Charles. For this purpose Carracciolo, the apostolical prothonotary, was fent with full powers from Charles to negotiate at Venice. In this he found great difficulty, as Francis gave the Venetians the strongest assurances that he was making preparations again to march with a powerful army into Italy, while the imperial party pretended that he had no fuch intention.

perialists.

Milan

Cardinal Medici recovers

THE fate of Italy, at this time, depended, in a great meafure, on the part that the Florentines were to act. The politic cardinal de Medici's capital enemy, Sederini cardinal of bis credit Volterra, was the greatest favourite the pope had, and de at Rome, Medici knew himself obnoxious to all parties, on account of the double dealing measures of Leo's pontificate. He therefore seemed to abandon, now that the papal chair was filled, all thoughts of public business, and retired to Forence, where his power and influence were unlimited. His gentle manners, his forgiving disposition, his liberality, and above all, the many good offices which his fituation had enabled him to do for the Florentines, had won their affections; and in the dearth of money, with which both the French and imperialifts in Italy were afflicted, the friendship of Florence was of the utmost consequence; because they were then incomparably the richest people in Italy in ready money, though perhaps not the most powerful. The proposed treaty between Charles and the Venetians produced great debates in the Venetian senate; but as it was now known that the cardinal de Medici and the Florentines were devoted to the pope, the imperial party prevailed; and the Venetians obliged themselves, by treaty, to fend fix hundred men at arms, fix hundred light horse, and fix thousand foot, to the defence of Milan if attacked, tacked, and as many to that of Naples; Charles on his part engaging to guaranty, with a like force, all the Venetian possessions in Italy. Upon the conclusion of this treaty, the Venetians made the duke of Urbino their general.

As the reputation of cardinal de Medici and the Florentines to which had contributed greatly to this new treaty, the cardinal ven- be repairs. tured to repair to Rome, where he was received with the greatest marks of respect. He soon got the better of the cardinal of Volterra, who was a hot man, and an enthuliast for the French interests; for he discovered to the pope a correspondence held between Volterra and the French court; in which the former pressed Francis to invade Sicily, as the surest means of succeeding in the Milanese. The pope, amazed at this discovery, at the earnest request of the duke of Sessa and the cardinal de Medici, sent Volterra prisoner to the castle of St. Angelo, and ordered him to be prosecuted for high treason, as Sicily was a fief of the church. This discovery rivetted the cardinal de Medici in the pope's affections; and he now refolved openly to declare himself against Francis. On the third of August, a league was signed between the pope, the emperor, the king of England, the archduke of Austria, the duke of Milan, the cardinal de Medici and the Florentine flate in conjunction, and the Genosse. By this league, it was stipulated, that an army should be raised for the desence of any of the confederates who should be attacked in Italy: that this army should be composed of two hundred men at arms furnished by the pope, eight hundred by Charles, two hundred by the Florentines, and two hundred, with as many light horse, by the duke of Milan. The pope, Charles, and the duke, were to provide artillery and ammunition at their own expences. The pope, the Florentines, and the duke, were each to pay twenty thousand ducats a month towards the war, the emperor thirty thousand, and the states of Genoa, Sienna, and Lucca, ten thousand amongst them, the two latter being admitted into the league. The marquis of Mantua was not directly made a party in this treaty, because he received pay from the pope and the Florentines as their general.

DEFEATS, disgraces, disappointments, and the lately The concluded treaties, seemed only to render the French king French the more bent upon invading Italy, and to quicken his king pre-Though a brave, open, good natured prince, pares to he had, at the instigation of his mother, been guilty of the invade most flagrant injustice to the duke of Bourbon, his near relation, and the greatest, as well as the most deserving of his subjects; for he had encouraged a law-process to vest her with his estate; and he, in other respects, had treated the duke with great neglect and contempt. The spirit of the duke, who was then great constable of France, and the most popular man in that kingdom, could not bear all this; and he secretly linked himself with the emperor, and the king of England, upon terms foreign to this history. Francis did not discover this conspiracy, which went even so far as to strip him of his grown, and to make the duke king of Provence, till he had begun his march for Italy; and then it was too late, for the duke escaped in disguise to Franche Compte. The discovery altered the resolution of Francis of going to Italy in perfon, and he committed the care of the expedition to the admiral Bonivette, a man unequal to fuch a charge. Bonivette carried with him eighteen hundred lances, fix thouland Swifs, two thousand Gascons, two thousand Valesse, fix thoufand Germans, twelve thousand French, and three thousand Italians. He surprized Novera and Vigevano, and took the Milanese unprovided, the allies not imagining, that, after the two treaties, that had been concluded, and the discovery of the duke of Bourbon's rebellion, Francis would have proceeded in his expedition; add to this, that Colonna, their commander in chief in the Milanefe, laboured under an indisposition. He had flattered himself with being able to prevent the French from passing the Tession, but they passed it at Vigevano, and he was obliged to retreat towards Milan. after fending Antonio de Leva, with one hundred men-at arms, and three thousand foot to defend Pavia. The fortifications of Milan were so out of repair, that they could not be defended, 'had the French immediately marched to that capital; but after trifling away some days, which gave the allies time to repair the works, they marched to San Christofore, within a mile of Milan, and then to Chiaravalle, proposing to lay a regular siege to Milan, which was garrisoned by eight hundred men at arms, eight hundred light horse, four thousand Spanish foot, fix thousand five hundred Germans, and three thousand Italians.

with

During this state of the war, the confederates received a shock by the death of pope Adrian, its author and support. While the holy see was vacant, very little discipline was observed amongst the confederates; and at this time Guicciardini (if we are to believe his own history) did great Death of service to the confederates. The duke of Ferrara, who had been deceived by Adrian, attempted to recover Modena and Reggio, of which Guicciardini continued governor. For this purpose, he joined Renzo, who had with him two thousand foot, and two hundred horse; and advanced against Modera, w hich pope Adrian. which was but poorly provided for a defence. All Guicierdine's eloquence could scarcely persuade the citizens of Modena, though they hated the family of Este, of which the duke of Ferrara was the head, that they ought to defend themselves at their own expences; but at last he succeeded so well, that they raised some money, which paid the Spanish garrison; and the duke despairing of succeeding against Modena, marched against Rezgio; which, with its castle, was succeeded to him; as was Rubiera, though a place of great

Arength, and well provided for a defence.

ABOUT one thousand of the Florentine troops, under the The marquis of Mantua, was at this time quartered at Lodi; but French Bonivette sending the famous chevalier Boyard, and Bozzile defeated in against him, with eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Lombarmen at arms, the marquis, fearing he might be obliged tody, furrender prisoner of war, retired to Ponte Vice; upon which the French entered Ledi. The other operations of the war at this time confifted of skirmishes, surprisals, marches, and counter-marches, of no consequence to history. The viceroy of Naples had been, by the interest of the cardinal De Medici, named to the chief command of the confederate troops in Lombardy. Colonna, not brooking this preference; tesolved to exert himself, and if possible to make the period of his life and his command the same, in which he succeed-He earnefully endeavoured to procure the interest of a Florentine regiment of men at arms under Vitelli, which had done great services against the French at Genoa; but the doge declared he could not part with them, without endangering the imperial interest there. The French were all this while losing vast numbers of men before Milan; and, through the over caution of their general, they were become even despicable to their enemies. The vacancy of the popedom still continuing, Colunna, who, like the other Roman barons, hated the power of the popes, tempted the duke of Ferrara to join him, by offering to order the Spanish foot to quit Modena, and to put it into the duke's hands; Colonna consented, but Guicciardini coming to the knowledge of the negotiation, persuaded the garrison not to obey Colonna's orders, by which the place was faved to the holy fee.

THE French army all this time made no progress against and proMilan; and though strongly encamped, the season was so pose a severe, that they proposed a truce. Pagolo Vittori, the Flo-truce.

remine commission, was employed in the negotiation, and would gladly have agreed to the proposal; but the German officers, who knew the straits to which the French were reduced, rejected it; upon which the admiral broke up his camp,

camp, and retired towards the Tessino. Both the garrison and the inhabitants of Milan called out to Colonna for a pursuit; but he boasting, that he had reduced the art of war to a regular intellectual system, which admitted leaving nothing to fortune, repressed their ardour, and would not suffer a man to leave the city; by which it is probable he lost the opportunity of ruining the French army. Notwithstanding this omission, it is certain he did wonders in his command, by obliging so great an army to retire with so much ignominy, and by the provident dispositions he made all over the Milanese, where he secured every place and pass of importance, and, without risking any thing, lest his enemies to perish, which they did in vast numbers, by the diseases contracted through the unwholesomeness of their encampments, and the inclemency of the season.

Cardinal Medici chosen pope.

THE election of a new pope had now taken up fifty days. Cardinal De Medici had secured to himself a considerable majority of the thirty nine cardinals, who were shut up in the conclave; but the opposition he met with from all the French, and even some of the imperial party, prevented his being able to bring over two-thirds of the number, which alone can make the election valid. It was evident to the cardinals that none could be chosen if he opposed him; so that it was in his power to protract the election as long as he pleased; and it was plain, at the same time, he was determined to carry it in his own person. The cardinals in the opposition could not agree in the nomination of a competitor against him; and at last, partly by his infinuating, placable address, and partly by offering, if chosen, to divide all his ecclefiaftical preferments, which were very rich and numerous, amongst the members of the college, he was unanimoully cholen pope.

His charatter. HE took the name of Clement VII. and no pope ever mounted the pontifical throne with greater advantages than he did, not only on account of the vast personal reputation he had acquired, but because he was considered as being, in a manner, the sovereign of the Florentine state. The character of abstemiousness, perseverance, and application to business, he had acquired, daunted all the adversaries of the holy see; resettled the affairs of the Romagna, and obliged even the duke of Ferrara to give over his design upon Modena, and to retire in quiet to his capital. The war in Lombardy, however, still raged; but Colonna, by his foresight, bassled the French in all their attempts. That great man now drew near the end of his life. Perceiving that his disease, which had hung about him for eight months, endangered his saculties, he was for some weeks before his death as desirous of the arrival of his successor, the viceroy, as he had been averse to it before. He was on his death-bed when the viceroy arrived; but the latter was so struck with admiration at Prospero's conduct, that he resused to enter Milan, or to supersed him in his command. At last, hearing that Colonna was in his ast moments, unwilling that so great a man should die before he had the satisfaction of seeing him, he paid him a visit, and received his parting breath. What is remarkable of this great man is, that he fell a sacrifice to the consequences of gratifying a violent passion he had for madam Chiara, one of the finest women of that age.

In the beginning of the year 1524, the confederates held 1524: a general meeting at Milan, to concert the operations of the General subsequent campaign, and the means of defraying its meeting of charges. They were provided of every thing to render it the confesuccessful, but money. Their troops had been long without derates. pay; and it was necessary to raise the funds for the new levies that were making in Germany. Notwithstanding all the French had suffered, their king was so sanguine upon the Italian expedition, that he had surnished Bonivette with troops, that rendered him an over-match for the confederates. The pope, dreading the consequences of a French victory, privately lent Charles thirty thousand ducats, and obliged the Florentines to lend him thirty thousand more, in sull of all demands, on account of the consederacy they had entered into in Adrian's time.

NOTWITHSTANDING this mark of affection to Charles, it is certain that the moment Clement mounted the pontifical throne, he changed the whole system of conduct he had professed before. He saw that if Charles, who never had yet The tione given the investiture of Milan to Sforza, was victorious in changes his · Lombardy, he would give law to Italy; and therefore his system. scheme was to ballance parties, so as to counterpoize one another. He therefore all of a fudden began to recommend peace and moderation to both; and affected the utmost impartiality. Charles was disgusted at so strange an alteration of behaviour. He ordered his ministers at Rome to remind the pope of all the obligations he had conferred on him, and particularly in the affair of his election; but above all, that it was by his counsel, which directed Leo in every thing, that he had entered into war with the French. Clement did not deny the charge; but frankly owned, that a pope, the common father of Christendom, was not to be directed by the conduct of a cardinal; and that pope Clement was a different person from Julio de Medici.

 T_{HE}

Superiorily of sibe confederates in Lombardy.

THE confederates all this time acted with a manifelt superiority in the Milanese, where Giovanni de Medici acquired great reputation by his valour and conduct. The marquis of Pescara, who, with all the prudence and foresight of Colenna, was enterprizing and resolute, was now the acting general of the confederates. The disposition of the two armies was such, that the French hoped the confederates would disperse for want of money; and the consederates, that the French must decamp for want of provisions. The castle of Cremona, after enduring a severe siege, now surrendered to the imperialists, who then passed the Tessino, in hopes of intercepting the French convoys. This obliged Benivette to decamp, and move with his aimy, many of whom had deferted to Nevara, to favour his junction with 8 or 10,000 Swiss, who were on their march to assist him. While he was upon this march, he encountered great inconveniencies; and his whole army must have been cut in pieces, if the confederate generals could have agreed on the manner of attack; but each differed from another, and all of them hated Pefcara much, that no measure he proposed was agreed to. The advantage, however, that presented against the enemy in their retreat to Ravisingo was so manifest, that the soldiers of their own accord ran to their arms, and pursued them, to that they left seven pieces of cannon in the hands of the imperialists. Next day the pursuit was renewed, and the marquis of Pescara coming up with a few troops, the French loss was confiderable, especially in officers; among whom was the chevalicr Bayard, who is faid to have been one of the best and bravest men that France ever produced. Upon the whole, the French were entirely driven out of the Milanefe.

The empefeilles.

THE main body of the French army, notwithstanding all the losses it had sustained, was yet entire; and though carries be- Charles endeavoured, by invasions and expeditions into France. fore Mar- to divert the war from the Milanefe, yet he was very unfuccessful in those expedients; and lost before Marseilles, which he in vain endeavoured to take, so many men, and so much reputation, that the disappointment threw him into a disorder which threatened mortal consequences. The French and their king were proportionably elated; and Francis declared his fixed resolution to march in person into the Milanese. The army of Charles had been greatly reduced by his late attempts in France, and that of Francis was stronger than ever. His resolution being publickly known, the pope endeavoured to dissuade him from it, and to mediate a peace. With this view he employed the archbishop of Capua to treat first with Francis, and then with Charles. Francis would not fuffer fuffer the archbishop to proceed in his negotiation, and recommended him to the care of his mother, who, till his return, was to reside at Avignon.

THE great question now between the French and the im- The perialists was, which army should arrive soonest in Lombardy. French Both arrived, by different routs, almost at the same time. invade The imperialists holding a council of war at Pavia, it was the Miles resolved that they should leave a strong garrison in that city, nese, and under Antonio de Leva, confisting of three hundred men attake Miarms, and five thousand German foot, and that they shouldlan. again make a stand at Milan. But when Morene, to whose care the preparations at Milan was committed, arrived at that city, he found that the plague was raging in it, and had. destroyed thirty thousand of the inhabitants, and it was easy to see the consequence, if an army should enter an insected city. Morone advised the inhabitants to submit to the French; and after providing for the safety of the citadel, he returned to Pavia, upon which a French garrison entered Milan, where none of the inhabitants were molested.

· FRANCIS was more elated than he ought to have been, by getting possession of Milan, and marched thence to Pavia. His army, including the garrison of Milan, amounted to twenty-four thousand foot, and two thousand men at arms, but was every hour increasing. The marquis of Pavia, who was then at Lodi, was overjoyed at hearing that Francis was gone to Pavia, and foretold the consequences that after happened. The imperialists, however, had still greater difficulties to encounter. Charles was so straitened for money, that he gave orders for mortgaging the revenues of his kingdom of Naples. Neither the pope nor the Florentines could be brought to advance him any, and his holiness declined to renew the engagements that had been entered into by his predecessor; thus, in fact, the whole burthen of the war rested on Charles, for the Venetians, intimidated by the French, refused to be farther concerned in it.

The fiege of Pavia was now formed by Francis, but in Francis so ineffectual a manner, that the imperial generals were in no besieges pain about the consequences. The pope renewed his endea-Pavia, vours for peace, and dispatched the bishop of Verona, in shew, to mediate between the two parties, but, in reality, to execute a secret commission with Charles. He found them equally contumacious. The imperialists would hear of no negotiation while the Francis king possessed a foot of ground in Italy; and Francis strankly owned to the bishop, that his intention was, after he had reduced the Milanese, to prosecute his rights upon Naples, by invading that kingdom. The bishop Mod. stirst. Vol. XXXVI.

The History of Florence.

then proceeded to his main business, which met with no dile ficulty. The pope promised to give no affistance, directly, to or indirectly, to the king's enemies, and undertook the farne on the part of the Florentines. The king, on the other hand, by an instrument signed by himself, (in which the superiority of the Medici family, over Florence, is expressly acknowledged) took both the pope and the Florentines into his protection, and it was agreed that this convention should not come to light, unless his holiness thought proper. Clement, by this measure, imagined, that he would gain so much upon Francis as to persuade him to lay aside all thoughts of invading Naples, but he was deceived. For it was no fooner. concluded, than he ordered the duke of Albany, the first prince of the blood of Scotland, to march to Naples, at the head of a confiderable army, which was to be reinforced in the Romagna with four thousand men, raised by Renze de Ceri; and, at the same time, he notified his intention to his holiness by the count of Corpi, his ambassador at Reme, who likewise was charged to demand leave from his holines to levy men in the ecclefiastical, and Florentine, dominions. This demand greatly embarraffed the pope, who laid before Francis many reasons for laying aside his Neapolitan expedition; but all would have been to no purpose, if some reinforcements that arrived at the imperial camp, had not rendered it expedient for Francis to recall the duke of Albama and the troops under his command.

tbreatens Naples.

and

The pope and Florentines Charles.

CHARLES, though his affairs had a promising aspect in Lombardy, was now under great difficulties. His resources for money had failed him, not only in Italy, but from the courted by king of England, who began even to demand the money that was due to him. The source of all the emperor's difficulties lying in the pope and at Florence, Charles offered Clement almost any terms he could demand; but his holiness insisted upon peace in Italy, or a neutrality to himself, which Charles declared was not in his power to grant him. The Spaniards and Germans in Lombardy, by the good management of the marquis of Pescara, though not paid, served Charles with wonderful fidelity, and Francis made but little progress in the siege of Pavia. A new body of Swiss and Grisons joining Francis, the duke of Albany was again dispatched upon the Neapolitan expedition, and the pope thought that a proper time for renewing his endeavours for peace. He fent Vettori, the commander of his gallies, to the viceroy of Naples, to shew him that it was not in his power to flop the duke of Albany's march; and that Naples being in the utmost danger, he could not do better than to consent.

to a cellation of arms. He added, that a definitive peace might be concluded, by putting Milan, in the mean while, into neutral hands; and by the emperor, for a fum of money, giving the investiture of that duchy to a second son of France, which would prevent it from ever being united to that crown. Clement likewise promised, that the dukes of Milan and Bourbon should be honourably provided for; and that he himself, the Florentines, and the Venetians, should guarantee the performance of the articles to the emperor.

THE viceroy, and the other imperial generals, seeing un- Firmness der what disadvantages they made war in Lombardy, and that of themarall their hopes of being supplied by the Florentines with quit of money were now damped, were willing to agree to this pro- Peicara. posal, and to draw off their army to the defence of Naples; had not the marguis of Pescara opposed the proposal with so much firmness and strength of reasoning, as determined the viceroy to reject all the pope's overtures, and to remain in Lombardy. This resolution served the pope as a pretext to excuse his granting the duke of Albany a passage through his dominions; and he addressed a brief on that head to Charles, who received it from Giovanni Corfi, the Florentine ambaffador at his court. Charles, on reading it, lost his usual moderation, and bitterly upbraided the pope for his treachery and ingratitude. The Florentine put Charles in mind, that his holiness, since his exaltation, had been the constant friend of pacific measures, and that all his counsels had been difregasded, to the great prejudice of Charles himself.

THE want of money amongst the imperialists in Lom- Complaints bardy continued to distress their affairs. The duke of Fer- of the imrara put himself under the protection of Francis; and the perialists viceroy complained that the pope infringed his neutrality by against she furnishing the French with waggons and carriages. Giovanni pope. de Medici at the same time quarrelled with the viceroy, and entered the French service, while the duke of Albany's motions towards Naples were so slow as to raise a belief, that the true intention of Francis was to frighten the imperialists into a cessation of arms.

IT was the beginning of the year 1525, before the duke of Albany, who had been joined in his march by Renzo with Progress of three thousand men, arrived at Lucca; and the Luquese being the duke of parties in the league against Francis, he forced them to pay Albany. him twelve thousand ducats. He then proceeded through the dominions of Florence, where he was treated with the highest respect, and proceeded to Sienna. The pope now began to be afraid that Francis was in earnest as to his attempt upon Naples. He had in vain tried every art to retard the duke of Alkany's march; but, upon his arrival at Sienna, his holiness entreated him to stop, that he might, by his authority, settle some differences between the Petrucci family and the council of Nice, in that city, the duke having been conversant in affairs of government. The pope, in paying this compliment to the duke, had a farther view than that of stopping his march; for, in fact, the Siennese, intimidated by the neighbourhood of the French army, made his holiness; a present of their liberties, by transferring the power of their magistracy into the hands of his friends.

The impe-

THE duke of Bourbon arrived with a new reinforcement rial army to the imperial army in Lombardy, of five hundred horse and in Lom- fix thousand foot, just at the time when the garrison began bardy re- to he distressed for want of money and ammunition. The viceroy, however, and the imperial officers, conveyed fome money by stratagem to the besieged, which contained them within the bounds of their duty; and the admirable address of the marquis of Pescara, prevailed with the troops, under the viceroy's and his command, to wait a month for their pay. This forbearance, and the arrival of the duke of Bourbon, determined the imperial generals, at all events, either to raise the siege, or to force Francis to a battle. were the more encouraged to this, as they knew that the French king was greatly imposed upon in his musters, and that he paid for one third more effective men than he really had in his army. Upon the first motions of the allies, Francis called a council of war, in which the most experienced of his officers gave it as their opinion, that he should raise the siege of Pavia, and remove to a ground (many such being in the neighbourhood) where he could not be attacked with any probability of fuccess. This advice was the most prudent, because it was certain, that the imperial army could not have subsisted many days in a body for want of money and necessaries, and that all the marquis of Pescara's dependance was upon an immediate and a decifive engage-Pavia, in ment. But, though this counsel was backed by the pope's ambassador, who well knew the straits of the imperial army, it was rejected by Francis, who thought that his raising the fiege would reflect upon his honour, and called to remembrance some idle words that were frequently in his mouth, that he would lose his life rather than raise the siege of Pavia. He, however, changed the disposition of his army, so as to render the approaches of the enemy more dangerous; but, in the mean while, he suffered the enemy to take possession of the most important posts in the neighbourhood. All the motions of the imperial army were conducted by the fagaeity and intrepidity of the marquis of Pescara, who led the imperialists

Battle of zwbicb

imperialists, by regular degrees, from one post of danger to another, till they came within cannon-shot of the French army, which lay within intrenchments. Some days passed in skirmishing and cannonading each other, and in each waiting for a favourable moment to begin the attack. At last, on the 25th of February, necessity obliged the marquis of Pescara to move towards Mirabello, where a strong post of the French was. This induced the king to march out of his intrenchments, as thinking that the enemy defigned to relieve the town by forcing that post. Francis had some days before fultained an irreparable loss by a wound which Giovanni de Medici, the most promising young general of that age, received in the heel, and which obliged him to be carried to Piacenza. This accident wonderfully dispirited the French troops, who had but a mean opinion of the own generals and officers; so that when the imperialists advanced within the park of Mirabello, all was confusion and disorder in the French army; especially amongst the cavalry, which moving irregularly to the right and left, exposed the division commanded by the king to the best battalions of the imperialists, led on by the marquis of Pescara himself. Francis made a noble resistance, and behaved so bravely in his own person, that the marguis was repulsed, and obliged to call the viceroy and the German foot to his affistance; the battle was now renewed; the behaviour of the Swi/s in the French pay that day, in no degree answered their reputation; they were routed and cut in pieces by the German foot; and Francis, who disdained to fly, was, with a handful of his nobility and officers, furrounded by the victorious army. He continued fighting with the most un-the daunted resolution, endeavouring to rally his troops, and French to stop the progress of the enemy; but, at last, being king is wounded in the face and hand, and brought to the ground taken priby his horse being killed, he was made f prisoner, by the soner. only French officer who had followed the duke of Bourbon to Italy. He did not know the king, who feeing the viceroy near him, discovered himself; and the viceroy most respectfully kissing his hand, received him prisoner in the name of the emperor. By this time the rout of the French army was completed. The marquis De Guafto had defeated the French horse that had been posted at Mirabello; and Leva, who had so gallantly defended Pavia, made a most surious fally with his garrison, which completed the ruin of the French army. About eight thousand of the French were killed, and most of the rest were taken and plundered, not to mention the vast loss which the French sustained in their nobility; the flower of whom were, that day, either killed or taken prisoners. The loss of the imperialists was about eight hundred men. As foon as the news of this defeat reached Milan, Trivulzi, the French governor there, and his garrison abandoned that city; and thus the Milanese was once more cleared of French troops.

f VOLTAIRE.

Ina&iwity of Charles.

IT is to this day unaccountable, that Charles did not make greater advantages than he did of his victory at Pavia, as he certainly now had it in his power to have marched into the heart of France, and to have made good all the imperial claims in Italy, which would have amounted to little less than a fovereignty over the whole. But Charles was then intent on fettling the government of Spain, and was not much subject to resentments of any kind, though he certainly had no reason to be satisfied with the conduct of the pope, the Florentines, or the Venetians, who had all of them, for no very justifiable reasons, forfeited their engagements with him.

Danger of

THE danger of Florence gave the pope more concern than Florence. that of the ecclefiastical state, because he considered the Florentines as the subjects of his family. While he remained connected with prosperous allies, the Florentines apppeared perfectly refigned to his will. But having, for some time past, been considered in Italy, and all over Europe, as a partizan of France, the secret enemies of his family in Florence, who were numerous and powerful, began to put their countrymen in mind of those days of liberty they enjoyed during the eighteen years expulsion of the Medici family. It appeared by letters and papers found in the French king's cabinet, taken at the battle of Pavia, that the pope had been the main instrument of bringing the Venetians off from the imperial interest; and that, in short, he was the secret fpring of all the hardships they had lain under before the battle of Pavia. Weighed down by reflections on those difcoveries, and on his own conduct, he fet about drawing up a kind of an apology for himself, the matter of which was to be digested in the form of briefs, and sent to the imperial and other courts. In those briefs he pleaded necessity for all that he had feemingly done against the imperial interest. and mentioned the vast obligations that the emperor and the house of Austria lay under to himself, and, by his means, to his two immediate predecessors. He complained of the refervedness of the imperial generals; and put the emperor in mind, that a body of ecclefiastical and foreign soldiers were in his service in the battle of Pavia; and he magnified the service he had done to the emperor, by artfully amusing the duke of Albany, so long about the Siennese affair, that he thereby faved the kingdom of Naples.

Were

THE Venetian senate, on this occasion, preserved a won- Proposal derful ferenity. Instead of desponding, like the pope, they of the Verepresented to him, that, if he was disposed to act with spirit netians. and courage, and to join with them, they might yet fave Italy from the imperial yoke. Nothing was more practicable, than for his holiness to persuade the Swift cantons to lend him a body of ten thousand men, for which the Venetian's were willing to bear their proportion of the expence; and the Florentines were rich enough to raise another body of Italian foot; and there was little doubt to be made of their being joined by the army under the duke of Albany, which had not yet marched beyond the limits of the ecclefialtical state; and, that the duke of Ferrara, who had a great deal of money, with a strong fortified and well provided capital, would likewise join them. The substance of this proposal had, before the battle of Pavia, been laid before his holiness by the Venetians, as a proper measure, which soever fide got the victory. But it was then neglected; he adopted it, however, in the present desperate state of his affairs; and was on the point of figning a convention on that head, when the archbishop of Capua arrived at his court.

This prelate had been long employed in Clement's affair, and he no sooner heard of the battle of Pavia, than he paid a visit to the viceroy of Naples. The gaining the battle of Pavia was so far from removing the difficulties the imperial generals were under before it was fought, that it increased The pate them. The foldiers became licentious through the booty amujed by they had acquired, and were as clamorous as ever for their the vice. pay, which their officers could not advance them. Lanoya, roy, the viceroy of Naples, therefore, in hopes of drawing money from the pope, appeared well disposed to enter upon an accommodation with him, and gave the archbishop of Capua a commission for that purpose. To enforce the negotiation, however, he drew down troops to the frontiers of the ecclestallical state, into which he threatened to penetrate, to find out the duke of Albany, and his master's other enemies there. Before the arrival of the archbishop of Capua, the pope had fent a minister to dispose the king of England to join in depressing the power of Charles. But Clement, who was naturally indolent, and averse to violent measures, no sooner heard the report of the archbishop of Capua, than he chose the way of negotiation. He recalled his minister, who was on his road to England; he prevailed with the duke of Albany to dismis his Italian soldiers, and he brought about a cessation of arms between the French and imperial parties that were in and about Rome.

When the negotiation opened, the viceroy infifted upon the Venetians, and all the other parties in the holy league formed under Adrian, paying up all their arrears and deficiencies in monley, which the Venetians refused to do. As it was plain that the viceroy had set this negotiation on soot, only to get some ready money, the Florentines, rather than that it should prove abortive, supplied the marquis of Pescara with twenty-five thousand ducats; but took care to obtain under Gatinara's, the imperial plenipotentiary's, hand, an acknowledgment that this sum was to be reckoned as part of a greater to be settled by the new convention. In the mean while, the duke of Albany, with Renzo de Ceri, embarked the remainder of his troops for France, with the consent of the viceroy.

The obstinacy of the Venetians, in resulting to pay the money demanded by the viceroy, was of service to the pope,

A convention concluded.

because it convinced the imperial generals, that there was no underhand dealing between them; fo that, at last, on the first of April, a convention was concluded between the pope and the Florentines on one fide, and Gatinara as plenipotentiary for Charles, or rather for the viceroy of Naples, on the other, the Venetians being excluded. By this convention, the contracting parties guarantied, with a certain number of troops, the possession of the duchy of Milan The forms. to Francesco Sforza. The emperor took under his protection the ecclesiastical dominions, and the state of Florence, specifying the house of Medici, and its power, in that city. Charles was to be paid, in ready money, a hundred thousand ducats, by way of arrears, to recall his troops from the ecclefiastical state, and to suffer no others to be quartered there without consent of his holiness. Twenty days were left for the Venetians to accede to the treaty; and the hundred thousand ducats were to be repaid, if Charles did not ratify the treaty, in five months. By one of the separate articles it was provided, that the duke of Ferrara should restore to the church Reggio and Rubiera, and all the places he had taken from it during the late vacancy of the holy see; in confideration of which, the pope was to pay another hundred thousand ducats to Charles. The last article was clogged with a condition, that examination should be made, whether those places were field of the empire, in which case the pope was to hold them as such. Paulus Jovius, in his life of the marquis of Pescara, e very justly blames this last article as infamous on the part of the viceroy, who had received money from the duke of Ferrara, on condition that those places should not be restored to the pope.

HAD it been possible for the Swiss to have arrived, and Progress the other levies to have been made time enough to have op- the impeposed the progress of the imperialists in Italy, this treaty rialists. might have been confidered as difgraceful; but, as matters were fituated, the wifer part of mankind thought it prudent; because, though the imperial generals were greatly distressed for want of money, they might still have prevailed upon their troops to take the field, by promising them the plunder of rich ecclesiastical, or Florentine, towns and churches. Both parties seemed to be equally satisfied, and the pope obtained leave to fend his compliment of condolence by the bishop of Pistoia, to Francis. The viceroy next proceeded upon his main, and, indeed, his fole business, which was to raise money. He gave the Lucquese his master's protection for ten thousand ducats; and he exacted fifteen thousand from the Siennese, whose situation was somewhat particular. Though the duke of Albany's authority had obliged them to re-establish the council of nine, who were the pope's creatures; yet, no sooner was the defeat of the French at Pavia known, than both the imperial and papal parties, in Sienna, applied to the viceroy for favour; and he, by giving general answers to both, brought both to consent to furnish him with their money. While it was telling out, Severini, a Genoese citizen, who had been an agent with the viceroy, murdered another citizen, one Bichi, whom he intended next year to have placed at the head of that government, and thereby that noble city, so important by its situation between Rome and Florence, was recovered to the imperial interest: it was thought that the viceroy, however he might dissemble, abetted this revolution. Other states followed the example of Sienna, and all Italy seemed now to ply under the will of Who gain the conqueror. The marquis of Montferrat made a present Sienna. to Charles of fifteen thousand ducats; and the duke of Ferrara advanced the viceroy fifty thousand, in part of payment of a greater sum. The states of Milan, the Genoese and Lucquese, stood engaged for certain sums, and Charles sent his generals in Italy fresh remittances. Historians are, to this day, at a loss to account for the farther inactivity of Charles at this juncture. It was expected that the viceroy, instead of treating with the pope, would have marched to the gates of Rome, and have completed those conquests, which the most most powerful of his master's ancestors had in vain aspired after; but, instead of that, Charles would admit of no congratulations, or rejoicings; for his victory; and fpent his time in processions and prayers, that it might turn out to the good of Christendom. Those historians, perhaps, come nearest to truth, who say, that this moderation of Charles was unfeigned; there feems, at least, no other probable cause to be affigued for it. His moderation went so far, that when the Venetian ambassador excused the conduct of his massers during the late war, Charles received it in good part; though he told the minister at the same time, he was perfectly well fatisfied, that every word of it was a falshood. affembled his council to consult upon the disposal of his royal prisoner. Some were for setting him generously free, others for imposing hard terms upon him. Charles, who knew no extreme either of generolity or severity, sent Buren. one of his favourites, to Pizzigittone, where Francis was, to propose the terms on which he might regain his liberty. which Francis thought to be so hard, that he rejected them; but offered to renounce all his claims upon Milan and Naples.

Moderation of Charles,

THE moderation of Charles was more than over-balanced bitancy of by the haughtiness and extravagant behaviour of his officers bis troops. and foldiers, in Italy, after the battle of Pavia. The pope, in order to check them, ordered the convention he had made with the viceroy, to be immediately published, with the most solemn formalities, before the ratification of Charles This, however, did him very little fervice; for when the Florentines, by his defire, were ready, according to treaty, to have paid the arrears of their subsidy, the viceroy refused to deduct the 25,000 ducats, which they had advanced to the marquis of Pescara, while the negotiation was in dependence; almost every other article of the treats was likewise violated. The state of the church was still full of imperial foldiers. The papal and Florentine parties in Sienna were mal-treated and plundered by the viceroy's orders or connivance; but that which gave the pope the greatest uneafiness of all was, the difficulty attending the restoring to him Reggio and Rubiera, which it was plain the viceroy encouraged the duke of Ferrara to retain. The viceroy's prevarication in this affair was shameful; and as the Florentines were ready to have paid their money, the public began to suspect that Charles designed to humble the pope, and to oppress the liberties of Italy. At last, after many folicitations, the imperial ratification of the late convention vention arrived; but without that of the three feparate articles. Charles excused himself from imposing any terms upon the duke of Milan, who, though a feodatory of the empire, was mafter of his own dominions and revenues. As to the affair of Reggio and Rubiera, he defired to be excused from doing any thing in prejudice of the right of the empire; and the duke of Ferrara acknowledging to hold them as fiefs of the empire, therefore he could not possibly do fo flagrant an injustice, as to transfer them to the holy see. This declaration, however, was accompanied with certain firewd hints, that a great deal might be done by the seasonable application of money.

THE Florentines were the greatest sufferers on this occa- Hardhise fion. The viceroy, in order to touch the money, had agreed of the Flor to every thing that the pope had required; and the pope rentines, was fo very anxious to have the treaty fulfilled, and to remove every flumbling-block, that he had even prevailed with the Florentines to advance the whole sum of a hundred thoufand ducats before the ratification arrived. His holiness was Aruck with shame, dread, and concern, at the scandalous collusion, as he called it, between the emperor and his viceroy. He refused to accept the ratification, and insisted upon Charles immediately repaying to the Florentines the hundred thousand ducats, which all the ties of good faith obliged him to do. Charles, or rather his ministers, laughed at all his complaints; they pretended, that the treaty was ratified; that the restitution stipulated to be made by the Florentines was in a separate article inserted by inserior agents, who could conclude nothing to the emperor's prejudice. There are reasons to believe, that had Charles now listened to his ministers, the whole system of Italy would have been over-Their advice was to render the duke of Ferrara an effectual check upon the pope, by putting him in posfeffion of Modena; to reinstate the Bentivoglio family in Bologna, and to revive the dormant claims of the empire upon Florence, and the other Tuscan states, which he ought to take into his own possession. Clement was no stranger to those fuggestions, and losing all hopes of protection from France, he resolved to dissemble.

EVERY one who has read the English history knows, that Vanity of the great ambition and vanity of Henry VIII. who was now Henry on the English throne, led him to be the umpire or arbitra-VIII. For of all differences amongst European states; and even England, Italy, remote as it was, must feel his influence, and the power of his minister Welfey. It was to them that the Florentines and the Venetians owed their independency, and their not

pecoming

ruffled by Charles having now twice disappointed him of the popedom, and for his discontinuing, fince the battle of Pavia, certain marks of personal attention, which he had always paid him before. He therefore began to impress his master with apprehensions of Charles's growing power, and of the danger England might be in by his invading France; and Henry received his infinuations to favourably, that he intimated his disposition to serve Francis, to his mother the lady regent of France, during her fon's captivity. The pope at this time feemed to be as zealous as ever for restoring the tranquillity of Italy, and for obliging Charles. He continued to mediate between him and the Venetians, from whom the viceroy demanded, not only the guaranty of the Milanofe, but the full fum of which they were in arrears by their treaty with the emperor in Adrian's time. The Venetians offered eighty thousand ducats; but the viceroy insisting upon a hundred thousand, the debates continued; the viceroy not chusing to break off the negotiation, because he was in great want of money. Mean while most of the Germans in the imperial pay in Italy had been dismissed; and the Venetical, being apprifed of the coldness between Charles and the king of England, plucked up spirit enough to refuse to comply with the viceroy. The pope, and the Florentines, and, indeed, all the Tuscan states, began, from the same reasons, to fland on the like terms; and the viceroy plainly faw that he removed to could not answer his detaining Francis longer in Lombarts, for fear of a rescue, and by his own consent he carried him by sea to Spain. The negotiations between the two monarchs are foreign to this history. Charles seemed to be more than ever fond of restoring a good understanding amongst the christian powers. At first he intended to have repaired to Italy in person, but business detained him in Spain; from whence he folicited the pope to fend cardinal Salviati, with full powers to treat of an universal peace, and with a dispenfation to marry his cousin-german, the infanta of Portugal, who was to have brought him an immense sum in ready money. He likewise gave orders that all possible means should be made use of for compromising matters between him, the Florentines, and Venetians; and at last he sent to Sforza the investiture of the duchy of Milan, in consideration of a large fum of money; though in fact, the investiture was clogged with fuch conditions that Sforza, even after receiving 4 was little better than a vassal to Charles. THE Imperial, Spanish, and Neapolitan, generals, under Charles, had by this time quarrelled amongst themselves. The marquis

Francis Spain.

quis of Pescara was so much provoked by Charles taking Discontent e or no notice of his services, that he appeared ready for and confpidesperate undertaking. Morone, chancellor and first mi-racy of the er to Sforza, a man of great capacity and dexterity in marquis of ness, made his master sensible, that he was little better Pescara. 1 a flave; and, in some private meetings, it was agreed. cut all the Germans in Italy to pieces, and to make the quis of Pescara king of Naples. As this could not be e without bringing the pope and the Venetians into the gn, it was communicated to both. It was too full of gerous importance for the pope to adopt it; and yet it , what of all things, he wished might succeed. He took iddle way between concealing and discovering it, for he the emperor upon his guard against discontenting his erals; and hinted, that he ought to have a watchful upon their conduct. The Venetians embraced the proil with great eagerness, in hopes of being supported by French and their regency. As to the marquis of Pefr, it is, as yet, a doubt how far he had been accesto the defign. The most probable opinion is, that at he had yielded to Morone's suggestions; but that afvards, feeing vast difficulties attending the execution, and the French court were so solicitous about recovering r king's liberty, that they were not disposed to exaspethe emperor, and deeply embarked in negotiating with , he resolved to discover the whole to Charles, who had ady received hints of it from Antonio de Leva, and rino, abbot of Nogera. A few days after the marquis of cara fent a trufty agent, informing Charles, of the whole spiracy, and obtained permission from him to continue practices till the whole extent of it was discovered. The quis upon this, laying aside all reserve, proposed in perthe execution of the defign to the duke of Milan, and vailed upon Morone to write to the pope, who deputed ufty agent, by a brief of credentials, to confer with the spirators upon the subject.

HE matter of deliberation was, that the pope, the French, His inten-Florentines, and other states of Italy, should enter into a tions, and sederacy, of which the marquis of Pescara should be cap-instructive,—general; that all the Spanish soldiers in the duchy of an, who would not join the marquis, should be put to sword; and that the consederates should then proceed he conquest of the kingdom of Naples, the investiture of ch was to be granted by the pope to the marquis, who no other difficulty remaining, but whether he might stain his honour and his conscience, by taking arms against

spainst Charles, who was the possessor of Naples, under 2 commission from the pope, who was its lord paramount; and defired that the point might be examined by civilians. Those unseasonable qualms, after proceeding so far, gave Morme some suspicion of Pescara's sincerity; but even that did not prevent the conspiracy from going on. The duches of Alenzon, fifter to the French king, had miscarried in a negotiation, which the undertook in person, for her brother's deliverance; and the regent promifed the conspirators a large fum of money, and 500 lances, to be fent to Lambardy, to favour their delign. Morone, upon this promise, demonstrated, that it was possible for them to execute their project, even though the marquis of Pescara should betray them; and he proposed, if he should give them any just cause of suspicion, to detain him, and his principal officers, prisoners in the castle of Milan, and to proceed in the execution of their defign. The pope would not have agreed to so dangerous a plan of operations, had he not been alarmed by the certain intelligence he received, that Charles was preparing to repair in person to Italy, and to put himself at the head of a great army. This news struck his holiness with terror; because the reverence for the holy see, which Charles professed, could be no bar to his profecuting the claims of the empire upon Florence, and the other Tu/can states. He therefore dispatched the secretary of the French embassy at Rome to conclude the negotiation with the lady regent of France; but he was murdered on his journey in the Bresciane, to the great disquiet of the pope, who was afraid he had been intercepted by the imperialists.

Appointed to comto commission from Charles, appointing him his captain-general mand for in Italy, which he accepted of. Charles likewise ordered the emperor Carraciolo, one of his ministers, to accommodate matters with in Italy. the Venetians; and affected to give orders for his troops to evacuate both the Milanese and the ecclesiastical state; and the marquis of Pescara, to continue his scene of dissimulation, actually withdrew some troops from the latter. This small savour was granted to the pope to soften him in the affair of the dispensation for his marriage; by which he was in hopes immediately to raise nine hundred thousand ducats ready fend the dispensation to the cardinal Salviati; but with an order to him, to produce or keep it back as he should see convenient for the affairs of his holiness.

money; and the pope was, at last, obliged, unwillingly, to

Betrays his It was now time for Charles to execute his great delign confede- upon Milan. The marquis of Pescara calling together his

of

army, he fent for Morone; who, forgetting all his usual maxims, repaired to Pavia, where the marquis had his head-He received Morone with great civilities, and carried him into a chamber, where Antonio de Leva was concealed behind the hangings. The conversation turned upon the grand design of putting all the Spaniards in Lombardy to the fword, and particularly Antonio de Leva; who, upon the marquis retiring, appeared, and taking Morone into custody, fent him prisoner to the castle of Pavia, where he made an ample confession of all the conspiracy against Charles. marquis then demanded of Sforza, to be put in possession of Frezzo, Lecco, and Pizzigittone, which are the keys of the duchy of Milan. This demand was complied with, and the marquis was even admitted into Milan; where he required the duke to fign an order for delivering up the castle of Cremona, and for putting into his hands fome of his ministers, who had been accused of a conspiracy against the emperor. who was lord paramount of Milan. Sforza refused to comply with those, and several other, demands, and insisted upon his innocency. Upon this the marquis obliged the people of Milan, greatly against their will, to take ah oath of sidelity to Charles; at the same he filled up all the vacant places of trust and profit in the duchy in his master's name, removing all the officers who had been appointed by the duke. and began to block up the castles of Milan and Cremona. Those proceedings overwhelmed the pope with forrow; as all his laboured scheme, for uniting Italy against the emperor. was now dashed to pieces, and he was left defenceless and exposed to the referement of Charles; and, at the same time. it put a stop to the progress of the negotiation between the emperor and the Venetians. In this criss, the marquis of 1525. Pescara, worn out by fatigue, died in the end of November His death. 1525. He had been early in war; and, tho' only thirty-fix years of age at the time of his death, he was accounted one of the most experienced, as well as able generals in Europe. His memory has been feverely handled by historians, for the double part he acted, towards the end of his life, between he Italian princes and the emperor. His death was an irreparable loss to the latter, who had no general equal to him, ither in abilities or authority, to fill his place. The Italian tates, on their fide, were as much embarrassed. They saw t impossible to carry their schemes, of a coalition, into pracice, without the affiftance of the French; which they knew would fail them, or perhaps be turned against them, upon he least hopes Charles should give them of their king's deligrance. The king of England was now the declared friend

495

Henry friends

of Francis, and had entered heartily into the Italian alliance. VIII. be- He offered to give security to the Florentines, that the French should not make a separate peace, and for the payment of the Francis; first quarter subsidy on their part. But all his assurances could not rouse the spirit of the pope, who acted on this occasion with great despondency. He began to undeceive the public, as to the good opinion it had entertained of him. when he first mounted the pontifical throne; for it now appeared, that the he had been an excellent and a fuccessful first minister, yet he was but a poor spirited, irresolute, pope. The ambaffadors of the confederates at Rome had brought him to confent to agree to the alliance against Charles; but on the very day he was to fign the articles, Herrera, animperial minister, arrived with new propositions for the protection of Milan, and the reduction of Reggio and Rubiera, which made him alter his purpole. While this matter was negotiating, a treaty was concluded between the emperor and Francis, by which the latter obtained his liberty; and the duke of Scija and Herrera offered, on the part of Charles, to withdraw the imperial army from Lombardy, provided the pope, and his allies, would advance them one hundred and fifty thousand ducats, and agree that the duke of Bourbon should recover the investiture of Milan, if Sforze should be found guilty of having conspired against Charles. Clement and his allies very properly thought, that the duke of Bourben possessing Milan, was the same thing as if it was in the hands of Charles himself; and having some intimation, that Francis was determined not to fulfil the terms on which he had been set at liberty, rejected the proposals, and sent Vittori, the Florentine commander of his galleys, to dispose Francis to enter into the proposed league; but Vittori died at Flirence on his road. The expectations of the public from the deliverance of the French king were very fanguine; and it is, at present, a doubtful point among casuists, whether he was bound in honour and conscience to fulfil the terms which he had granted, while he was under durance, and were confequently extorted, and so detrimental to his people and succellors, whose rights and possessions he could not dispose of The latter was the chief argument he made use of when he arrived at Bayonne: he acquainted the viceroy, who preffed him to ratify the treaty of Madrid, that he could not do it without the consent of the states of France. When the pope and the Venetians, who thought they must be ruined if he performed the treaty of Madrid, sent agents to sound him on that head, they found him furnished with a variety of arguments, foreign to this part of our work, to prove that

eubo is freed from prifun.

be was under no obligation to do it, and he shewed himself yery desirous of entering into a consederacy with the Italian states against Charles.

Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

THE castle of Milan, which held out against the impe-The castle rialists for Francis Sforza, was now reduced to great straits; of Milan and the whole duchy was laid by de Leva, who commanded befisped. the Spanish troops; under the most oppressive contributions. which at last drove the people to despair; and they endeavoured to expel the imperialists out of Milan; but their efforts were in vain, and served only to encrease their miseries: The pope's fears, at this time, drove him to act with rashness and precipitation. Instead of waiting the result of affairs between Francis and Charles, he hurried the Venetians and the other Italian powers into an immediate war, before the Swifs, on whom his great dependence lay, were in readiness to march; and before the king of England had formally acceded to the confederacy. Orders were fent to conclude, in all events, the treaty with Francis; and even before that could be done, both he and the Venetians put troops in motion for relieving the castle of Milan; but with orders not to act till advice came of the treaty being figned by Francis. The duke of Urbino, now general of the Venetians, advanced towards the Adda with their men at arms; and fix thousand foot; and Guide Rangene, the pope's general, had orders to be in readimess to march to Piacenza with six thousand soot, most of them Florentines. The duke of Urbino gave it as his opimion, that the confederacy would require twelve thousand Swifs, to enable it to act with effect against Charles, and the levies were trusted to Gianjacopo de Medici, a Milanese, and the bishop of Veruli. They each engaged to raise six thou- pretarafand men, who were to enter upon pay as foon as they ar- tions for rived in the duchy of Milan. Those proceedings, however, its relief. were interrupted by the irrefolution of Francis, who had delivered his two fons to Charles as pledges for the performance of the treaty of Madrid, and, on their account, was very backward in proceeding to hostilities. He offered Charles a fum of money in lieu of Burgundy; but he affured the pope and the Venetians, that he would make no peace with Charles, unless the duchy of Milan was evacuated, and the peace of Italy secured. Charles rejected the alternative of money; and, rather than agree to the proposals of Francis, he thought of re-establishing Sforza in the duchy of Milan. In the mean The Flowhile, the pope and the Florentines took into their pay the rentines samous Genoese admiral Andrew Doria, and eight of his gal- take Doria lies, under pretence of treeing those seas of the Moors and in- into pay. fidels; but, in reality, to oblige the imperialists to raise the

Κk

Siege

495

Henry friends Francis;

of Francis, and had entered heartily into the Italian alliance. VIII. be- He offered to give security to the Florentines, that the French should not make a separate peace, and for the payment of the first quarter subsidy on their part. But all his assurances could not rouse the spirit of the pope, who acted on this cecasion with great despondency. He began to undeceive the public, as to the good opinion it had entertained of him! when he first mounted the pontifical throne; for it now sppeared, that the he had been an excellent and a successful first minister, yet he was but a poor spirited, irresolute, pope. The ambassadors of the confederates at Rome had brought him to confent to agree to the alliance against Charles; but on the very day he was to fign the articles, Herrera, animperial minister, arrived with new propositions for the protection of Milan, and the reduction of Reggio and Rubiera, which made him alter his purpose. While this matter was negotiating, a treaty was concluded between the emperor and Francis, by which the latter obtained his liberty; and the duke of Scija and Herrera offered, on the part of Charles to withdraw the imperial army from Lombardy, provided the pope, and his allies, would advance them one hundred and fifty thousand ducats, and agree that the duke of Bourbon should recover the investiture of Milan, if Sforza should be found guilty of having conspired against Charles. Clement and his allies very properly thought, that the duke of Bourben possessing Milan, was the same thing as if it was in the hands of Charles himself; and having some intimation, that Francis was determined not to fulfil the terms on which he had been set at liberty, rejected the proposals, and sent Viltori, the Florentine commander of his galleys, to dispose Francis to enter into the proposed league; but Vittori died # Florence on his road. The expectations of the public from the deliverance of the French king were very fanguine; and it is, at present, a doubtful point among casuists, whetherhe was bound in honour and conscience to fulfil the terms which he had granted, while he was under durance, and were confequently extorted, and so detrimental to his people and secceffors, whose rights and possessions he could not dispose of The latter was the chief argument he made use of when he arrived at Bayonne: he acquainted the viceroy, who prefid him to ratify the treaty of Madrid, that he could not do it without the consent of the states of France. When the pope and the Venetians, who thought they must be ruined if he performed the treaty of Madrid, sent agents to sound him on that head, they found him furnished with a variety of arguments, foreign

anbo is freed from prifin.

of its being conquered, he should set at liberty the French king's children, and accede to the present treaty; that Francis should not only defend and affift the duke of Milan, but endeavour to effect a new confederacy between him and the Swifs, Sforza paying him a subsidy of not less than fifty thousand crowns a year; and that Sforza should likewise marry some noble French lady of that king's chusing; that Asti should be restored to Francis, and that in Genoa, when reduced, he should have the same superiority as heretofore; that the confederates should omit no means, either by reprefentation or force, to bring about the liberty of the young French princes; that after the Italian wars are finished, the confederates should be obliged to affish the king beyond the mountains again Charles, with one thousand men at arms. fifteen hundred light horse, and eleven thousand soot, or with money instead of troops, at the king's choice; that no member of the confederacy should have the liberty, without the consent of the others, to make an agreement with Charles. who should be permitted to make a progress to Rome (in case . he entered into the confederacy) for the imperial crown, with a number of troops not formidable, but such as should be directed by the pontiff and the Venetians; that in case of the death of any member of the alliance, the league should remain firm; and that the king of England should be protector and conservator of the same, with liberty to enter into it : and if he entered, a state should be assigned him in the kingdom of Naples, of the yearly revenue of fifty-three thoufand ducats, and one of ten thousand, either in the same kingdom, or in another part of Italy, to mollify the cardinal of York.

WE have been the more explicit in giving the contents Importance of this new holy league, as it is called by fome historians, of the Plobecause, though the Florentines were not mentioned in it as rentines. principals, yet all Europe very justly looked upon them as being the chief contracting parties. The ecclefiastical dominions, and the pope's coffers, were drained of men and thoney, and could furnish little or nothing towards carrying on the war; so that he was obliged to depend on the Florentines alone for both. It is remarkable, that the Florentines were exempted from being named as principals, left their commerce with the towns and other places belonging to Charles should be interrupted: it being only said, that they should enjoy all the exemptions, privileges, and benefits of the confederacy, as much as if they were expresly comprehended in it, the pope engaging they should in no manner K k 2 oppofe oppose the league. Notwithstanding those plausible pretexts, we cannot help thinking that the omission was ewing, in a great measure, to the jealousy of Clement, who thought that the naming the Florentines as principals, gave them too much the air of independence upon his family.

IT was necessary there should be a captain-general mpointed for the army of this league; but the time prefled to much, that the parties had not leifure to deliberate on an affair of so great moment. Francis delayed the ratification of all the articles, being still reluctant to break off all conferences with the viceroy; but put his army in motion, and remitted his first payment. The pope appointed Rangeme to command his erclesiastical forces, which were paid by Flarentine money, and lay now at Piacenza, where he ordered the Florentine men at arms under Vitelli, who commanded them in chief to attend him; and he appointed the brave Giovanni de Medici to be captain-general of the Italian infantry; as he did the historian Guicciardin, then president of the Romagna, to be lieutenant-general in the army, and in all the state of the church, with (as he tells us himself) almost unlimited powers. The Venetian army lay under the duke of Urbino, as captain-general, and Piero de Pesaro, as proveditor, in the Brescian; and both armies had orders to begin hostilities immediately in the Milanese.

Negociation between the imperialifts and the pope.

MONCADA was then in the castle of Milan, and endeavoured, but in vain, to bring the duke over to his master's interest. From Milan he proceeded to Rome, where, with the duke of Seffa and the imperial generals, he prefented himself before the pope, and baughtily offered him either peace or war. Clement's answer was, that he could determine upon neither, without confulting his ally the king of France This seems to have been the first certain information which Moncada had of the lately concluded holy league; and next day he offered, in the name of his mafter, to reinstate Simul in the duchy of Milan, provided that castle was deposited in the hands of Caracciolo, till certain immaterial forms of trial, which were requisite for Charles's honour, could be goe through; but the pope persisting in his answer, Montale and the imperialists left Rome in disgust. The duke of Urbino now acted as captain-general of the holy league; and though letters from de Leva and the marquis of Gualle had been intercepted, pressing Moncada to come to an accommodation with the pope, on account of the ruinous state of their master's affairs in Lombardy, yet the duke had so bad an opinion of the Italian infantry, and so high an one of the Spanish and German, that he refused to pass the Adda, unless he was reinforced by five thousand Swiss. He would not even pass the Oglio, unless he was joined by the ecclesiastical and Florentine army, which lay near Piacenza; and then he proposed to entrench himself upon the banks of the Adda till the Swiss should arrive. This dependence proved very precarious. The commissaries for raising them had neither money nor credit for bringing into the field the numbers they had engaged for; and great part of the levy-money was embezzled by the contractors. Those milmanagements retarded the relief of the castle of Milan; and the citizens, having again broken out into open hostilities against the imperialists, were again quelled and reduced by the deaths and expulsion of the ringleaders. To make some amends for this disappointment, for such it Lodi surwas to the army of the league, the duke of Urbino and Gia-prifed. vanni de Medici surprised Ledi and its garrison, one of the Rrongest and most important fortifications in all Lombardy.

^{*} Guicciardini, book xvii.

THE taking of Lodi might have been destructive to the Inactivity imperialists in Lombardy, had it not been for the over cau-of the duke tion of the duke of Urbino, who continued fingle in his opi-of Urbino. nion, though a passage over the Adda was now secured, against marching to Milan, without a large body of Swiss. At last he yielded so far as to consent to move from Lodi; but with very flow marches, and halting every fecond day in expectation of the Swifs. The whole army of the league being now joined, amounted to twenty thousand foot, with a proportionable number of cavalry; but the Venetian troops were much better mounted, and supplied with arms, artillery, ammunition, and provisions. The force they had to encounter was only three thousand German, and between five and fix thousand Spanish foot, lying in Milan, but destitute of every thing. There being yet no appearance of the Swifs, the confederates, flow as their marches were, drew near to Milan; and a council of war was held upon their method of approaching to relieve the castle. The duke of Urbino had not been formally constituted captain-general, and only acted as such with the tacit consent of the other confederate officers, on account of his great authority and reputation. Guicciardin, therefore, and the Florentine generals, and even the Venetian proveditor himself, were very free in censuring his backwardness, and blaming him for the fine opportunity he was losing of relieving the castle. At last, about fifteen hundred of the Swifs arriving, he was prevailed on, though against his inclination, to advance within three miles of Milan; and in a Kk3 councouncil of war, it was determined, July 5, by his sole authority, to take possession of the suburbs.

The duke of Bourbon arrives in Italy.

THE night before this measure was to have been put in execution, the duke of Bourbon, who had arrived at Genca with fix gallies, and bills of exchange for one hundred thoufand ducats, threw himself at the head of eight hundred chofen Spanish foot into Milan b. His arrival gave great spirit to the imperialists in that city, and as much disquiet to the pope. By the original plan of the war, Doria had undertaken for the reduction of Genoa, if joined by the French gallies at Marseilles, when hostilities commenced in Lombardy. Francis, who was still solicitous about his children, had omitted to give orders for this junction, which would have rendered Deria superior at sea; so that he could not only have prevented the Spanish gallies from entering Genoa, but have thut up its port, which in a very short time must have obliged that city to submit. The arrival of the duke of Bourbon in Milan, being unknown to the confederates, the duke of Urbino advanced with great confidence against the suburbs, where he expected no opposition; but he found them well guarded, and obstinately desended. This disappointment made him relapse into all his apprehensions from the valour and discipline of the enemy; and though he had made such dispositions that, notwithstanding all the resistance he met with, he must have carried the place; yet all of a sudden, in the night of the seventh of 'July, he ordered the artillery and ammunition to be drawn off, and all the Venetian troops to prepare for a march; and he sent notice to the Florentine, and the other general, that he expected they would follow his example. It was in vain for them to repair to his head-quarters, to enquire into the reason of so sudden and disagreeable a resolution. The reafons he affigned were, the cowardice of the Italian infantry, and the dispositions which the enemy had made of their artillery. He concluded, with peremptorily infifting upon a retreat to San Martino, where there was a strong camp, and that the army was not properly encamped on the spot where they were.

retiring

from Mi-

THOSE reasons were far from being relished by the other generals. Guicciardin represented to him the danger, as well Guicciar- as difgrace, of so sudden a decampment, which would difdin to the courage the pope, the Florentines, and the Venetians so much that it would ruin all the purposes of the league; and pro-Urbino on posed to encamp in another manner. The duke of Urbino

> b Siconius de rebus gestis Andreæ Doria, pag 229. Guic. book zvii.

would

would hear no reasoning upon this head, and his troops began their march in a most irregular tumultuous manner. According to Paulus Jovius, and other authors, Giovanni de Medici gallantly resuled to decamp by night; and at break of day he gave a furious assault upon the Roman gate of Milan, and made his retreat in good order. The duke of Urbino, instead of halting, as he had ordered his army, at San Martino, issued orders, while they were on their march, for their proceeding some miles farther to Marignano, under pretence that they would be there more safe from their being attacked by the Imperialists (A). When Guicciardin and the Florentine generals applied to him, to know the reason of this fresh disgrace, he refused to give them any answer; but, pointing to his general's baton, he told them, while he held that, he was resolved to suffer no encroachment upon his authority.

As the duke of Urbino had been always noted both for courage and conduct, his behaviour at this time amazed the public; and the rather, because, while he lay encamped at Marignano, he declared, that he found the attempt to relieve the castle of Milan so difficult, that he would not resume it, unless he was at the head of twelve thousand Swifs, and of an army double to that of the enemy.

THE imperialists in Milan could scarce believe their eyes, His mowhen they saw the disorderly retreat of the confederates, tives. nor did they fend a fingle troop out to molest them; and this drew fresh reproaches upon the duke of Urbino from the other generals. It was thought, with some appearance of reason, that the duke was secretly disgusted at the Florentines, who continued to keep possession of San Leo and Monte Feltro, and with the house of Medici, because the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici bore the title of duches of Urbino; and likewise, that he resented the hardships that had been put upon him by pope Leo, and by Clement himself, while he was a cardinal. Some imagined, that he had fecret instructions from the senate of Venice for what he did; but that is improbable, because it was against the Venetian interest as well as glory. Guicciardin is of opinion, that he really distrusted the Italian foot; and was afraid of being defeated by the imperialists. Whatever may be in those conjectures, it is certain that this retreat was fatal to the league. The pope had depended on the reduction of Milan, and had no resources either of courage, constancy, or money. A body of Spanish foot, garrisoned at

(A) Guicciardin, in speak- Cæsar, and have said, Feni, ing of this slight, said, that the widi, sugi, I came, I saw, I duke might reverse the boast of sled.

Carpi, laid waste all the ecclesistical dominions, and cut off the communication between Florence and the army, which was thereby diffressed for want of money. As to the Planstines, they still continued to supply him; but the necessities of his holiness were now encreased.

The pope diftreffed

THE family of Colonna, and the imperial party about Reme, had somented insurrections in that city, and were actually at Rome; in arms in its neighbourhood. This haid the pope under prodigious inconveniences, as the war was now carried on at the gates of his own capital. He began to contrive how to alter the government of Sienna; and was, by a presented traitor, deluded into an attempt upon that city, which, in case of a war continuing, he thought would be of the atmost consequence both to Rome and Florence, if it was reduced to his power. The plot being discovered, the Siemusse treated the plotters, foldiers, and party, with so much indignity, that he employed a body of Florentines, in conjunction with his own troops, to reduce them by force. The soldiers employed upon this occasion, amounted to twelve hundred both and eight thousand foot, but all of them new raised raw troops, and they approached the walls of Sienna with nine pieces of cannon. This army had in it a great number of exiles, whose interest within the city was very considerable; and they had given the Florentines the strongest assurances, that the army would no sooner appear before the city, than an infurrection of the people would happen. At the lame time Doria, with the pope's fleet, was employed in battering the ports of the Siennese by sea; but the hatred which the Siennese, of all ranks, entertained of the pope and the Florentines, deseated all the hopes of the latter. No infurrection took place, and the Florentines were obliged to lay a regular fiege to the city.

agrees to

His holiness being thus, as usual, disappointed in his fanan gnissice guine expectations, began to give ear to Moncada, who had now returned to Rome, under pretence of mediating between him and the Colonna party and the Siennese. This happened at the time when both he and the Florentines were thinking of withdrawing their army from Sienna. But an accommodation being now proposed, they desended it, as thinking that the continuance of the army before Sienna would give weight to the negociation. At last, being disappointed in that expectation likewise, orders were actually sent, both from Rome and Florence, for railing the fiege. The day before those orders were to have been executed, four hundred foot of the belieged fallied out of the city and attacked the artillery, which was guarded by a regiment under Jacopo Corfo, which immeimmediately gave way; and the whole army following the example, a total flight enfued, and the befiegers left in the hands of their enemies ten pieces of cannon belonging to the Eleventines, and feven belonging to the Perugians or the pope; all which were carried, with great triumph, into

THE progress of the war in Lombardy continued still to Diffress of be unfuccessful, on the part of the league. Five thousand of the Milathe Swift troops were arrived; but the duke of Urbino refused nele. so refume the operations of the campaign, without a farther reinforcement, which, on account of the infolence and avarice of the people, could not be obtained. The imperialists availed themselves of the duke's inactivity to fortify Milan, and to plunder the citizens, whose oppressions grew every day more intolerable. They had no recourse but in the duke of Bourbon, on whom Charles was said to have bestowed their city and duchy. They therefore addressed him in a body, for relief to their miseries. He promised them relief, upon their paying a fum of money; but after that was paid, their diftress was such that many of them put an end to their lives. The army of the league lay still at Marignano; and it was, at last, resolved to make an attempt for the relief of the castle; but after a fruitless motion for that purpose had been made, it furrendered by capitulation on the 24th of July. After the . furrender, the duke of Urbino infifted upon a general of the whole league being formally chosen, but that election was postponed; and the French king growing remiss in prosecuting the war, the pope lost all spirit. It is observed, however, by historians, that during this state of inactivity, Giovanni de en Medici trained the Florentine infantry in such a manner, that, from being contemptible, they became the best troops in the army. The pope, by this time, grew jealous of the king of England, who had not fulfilled his engagements with the league; and he folicited the French king to join with him and the Venetians, in the invasion of Naples by sea and land; but Francis continued still to treat with Charles, who applied himself more than ever to the affairs of the war; and his generals in Lembardy took Cremona, which the generals of the confederates again befreged, and it was again yielded to Sferza. In the mean while the marquis of Mantua, who remained inactive, and whose territories were in common to both parties, was again taken into the pay of the Florentines, his former time of service being expired. He was in no great seputation amongst the confederate generals, and, not being employed, he wisely kept his dominions neutral, by pleading to Charles that he was in the pay of the Florentines, and to the league league that he was the feudatory of the emperor. It was, however, necessary for the Florentines ro keep him in pay, because of the convenient situation of his states.

The Florentines uneafy.

THE Florentines, about this time, began very fensibly to feel the expences of the war, especially in Lombardy, which was carried on almost intirely at their charge; and shewed so much reluctance to advance more money, that his holiness was obliged to compromise matters with his enemies of the family of Colonna, who, breaking their agreement, surprised the gates of Rome, plundered not only his palace, but the church of St. Peter, and obliged him first to take refuge in the castle of St. Angelo, and afterwards to make a truce with the imperialists for four months. The Florentines were included in this truce, which was very disadvantageous to his holiness. By it he was obliged to withdraw all his troops from Lombardy; to order Andrew Doria to defift from all hostile enterprizes by sea; to pardon the Colonna family, and to give holtages for the performance. This truce broke all the scheme of operations in Lombardy, at the very time when, by the junction of the French troops under the marquis of Saluzzo, they began to wear a more favourable aspect. The pope, however, found means fo far to evade the truce, that he ordered four thousand of the Florentine troops to remain

The pope pope, however, found means so far to evade the truce, that takes re- he ordered four thousand of the Florentine troops to remain fuge in the with those in the league under Giovanni de Medici, on pre-castle of St. tence of their having been taken for a certain time into the Angelo. French pay Charles began pow to show himself a great and

French pay. Charles began now to shew himself a great and an able prince; and initead of being amused by the fair offers of the pope and his confederates, backed by the English ambassacor, he equipped an armament of forty sail in the port of Carthagena, and after putting on board it fix thousand troops, he fent it to Italy. The war still went on in Lombardy, because the pope's allies were not affected by the truce he had made at Rome; but nothing decisive happened on either part. The duke of Urbing still continued to differ in opinion from all the other generals of the league, and was therefore unfortunate in all his defigns and operations. The pope, after rendering himself contemptible to all the courts of Europe, by the pulillanimity and inconfiftency of his conduct, having recalled part of his troops from Lombardy, employed them under Vitello against the Colonnas, who he saw had forced them into the truce. This scheme likewise proving ineffectual, he entered into a negociation with the duke of Ferrara, which was broken off by the arrival of the Spanish troops in Italy, and by Charles sending to the duke the investiture of Modena and Reggio. By this time, a fresh army of about fourteen thousand Germans, under Fronsberg, had entered Lom-

Lombardy, and were opposed by the army under the duke of Urbino; but in a skirmish at Borgoforte, in the Mantuan, Giovanni de Medici lost his life, to the irreparable damage of the confederates, though he was, at the time of his death, no more than twenty-nine years of age. Negociations, nevertheless, still went on; and while the imperial army, and A new that of the league, were fighting in the field, their ministers imperialwere treating in the cabinet, both with equal effect; for the ifs enter war was carried on with pufillanimity, and the negociations Lombarmanaged with infincerity. The pope grew every day more dy. contemptible, and was deferted by the French king in an expedition he had formed against Naples, which at first had very promifing appearances of fuccess. The duke of Bourbon was now advancing against Rome itself, by the way of Tuscany; and his holiness was infinitely anxious about the fate of Florence, being followed but at the distance of about thirty miles by the duke of Urbino, whose caution was as much applauded by the Venetians, as it was blamed by the pope.

On the third of January, 1527, the duke of Urbino having Designs of advanced as far as Parma, began, under colour of illness, to the duke of make preparations for returning to Lombardy. He was still Urbino. attended by Guicciardin, who, from the beginning of the year, had observed that the duke had done all in his power to cross the interest of the pope and the Florentines; and from fome words that had dropped from him, he perceived he was not to be fatisfied, unless the latter restored to him San Leo and Montefeltro. Guicciardin knew that the public voice at Florence was for the restitution, and ventured, in the name of the republic, to promise it, and even pretended, that he received letters from his holiness to that effect; for which,

however, he was afterwards blamed by the pope.

THE duke of Ferrara, though he did not serve personally The duke in the imperial army, directed all its motions; and, by his of Bouradvice, the duke of Bourbon, without amusing himself with bon adtaking or garrifoning smaller places, pointed his march to-vances wards Florence and Rome. His army was in a most wretched against condition, and his troops obliged to pay themselves by the Tuscany contributions which they levied upon the places through which and Rome. they passed. The Spanish foot at first mutinied, and were, with some difficulty, reduced to order by the duke; but the Germans, who had not, ever fince their being raised, received above three ducats a man, ferved chearfully under the command of Fronsberg, whom they entirely loved, and who promised them the plunder of Rome, and the rich Italian provinces. It was with some difficulty that the marquit! Saluzzo secured Bologna from being surprized by the imps

The duke of Bourbon was now arrived at Buomporter and in a personal interview he had with the duke of Ferrara at Finale, he was confirmed in his purpose of marching directly to Florence, and from thence to Rome, though unprovided with money, artillery, pioneers, provisions, stores, and every thing that could promife him success in so desperate an undertaking. Being arrived in the Bologness, he, pretending that he was marching to the relief of the kingdom of Naples. demanded a supply of provisions. This demand not being speedily complied with, because the imperialists had no money, they were obliged to enlarge their quarters; and had there been the least conduct or union amongst the generals of the league, they might have been eafily surprized and cut in pieces; for the Spanish foot again mutinied for their pay, and had almost killed the duke of Bourbon, in endeavouring to appeale them, which he could not do without giving them a fum of money, which he borrowed from the duke of Ferrara.

Distress of be pope of nereases.

Pope Clement had now nothing to trust to but the wants of the imperialists, for preserving himself on the pontifical throne. All the pompous promises that had been made him by the French king, were now vanished into air; and though the king of England still continued his professions of friendship to the league, yet he was at too great a distance to afford his holiness any immediate relief. The Venetians were flow in their motions, and backward in their payments; so that the troops under the marquis of Saluzzo, quartered in the Bolognese, could not be brought to move; but, above all, be dreaded the spirit of the Florentines, who were now exasperated beyond measure, on account of the immense sums that had been extorted from them, without their having the leaft prospect of being reimbursed. All those considerations determined the pontiff to enter into a negociation with the imperial agents at Rome, for a suspension of arms during eight months; which was at last concluded, upon his holiness paying to the imperial army fixty thousand ducats, and reinstating the Colonnas in their lands and privileges. It was likewife agreed, that all the places which had been taken by either party in the ecclefiastical state, or the kingdom of Naples, should be restored. A certain time was to be allotted for the king of France and the Venetians to accede to this armissice; and the Germans, in any event, were to evacuate the ecclesiastical state, and that of Florence, upon the pope paying them the farther fum of forty thousand ducais. It is some letters from the duke of Bourbon, by which it appeared that he was in the utmost despair and distress. He therefore imprudently dismissed all his army, excepting one hundred light horse and two thousand foot, and sent Fieramosca, one of the imperial agents, who had concluded the armistice into the Bolognese, to procure the accession of the duke of Bourbon to the same. That duke, partly through policy, and partly dispirited by the temper of his army intent on plunder, delayed the ratification, and was busied in procuring from the duke of Ferrara a supply of all kinds of necessaries for his army. The pope ordered Guicciardin to apply to the duke, but he received only fair words; and at last Bourbon, pretending to be over-ruled by the tumultuous disposition of his army, gave orders for its marcing forwards. According to the best information, that duke was actually no longer mafter of his army, which would have killed a messenger from the viceroy of Naples, sent to desire him to accept of the truce, had he not fled. The pope thought that money alone was wanting to stop his progress, and he threw the charge of providing it upon the Florentines. Even the viceroy offered Bourbon twenty thousand ducats to appease his troops. But all was ineffectual; Guicciardin now faw that nothing but the activity of the confederates, who were in the Bolognese, could save the holy see from ruin. and therefore he folicited the marquis of Saluzzo, and the Venetians, to march directly to his affiltance; but the pope by this time had lost his credit with all parties. plainly faw that he would purchase peace upon any terms; and though the viceroy of Naples had come to Florence, to have an interview with the duke of Bourbon, to persuade him to forbear, yet all was ineffectual. The Venetians dallied with him; but far from refuling to affift him, they sent orders to the duke of Urbino, to decamp from Cafal Maggione, and to advance towards Tuscany; but all he did was fending two thousand foot to guard his own dominions.

Imprudence This agreement made the pope perfectly secure, and the st the pope, rather, because his lieutenant, Guicciardin, had intercepted

THE duke of Bourbon still continued his march towards Bourbon Tustany, though he had no notice that the viceroy remained marches testill at Florence, and had come to an agreement with the wards Florentines, that upon the payment of fixty thousand ducats. the duke of Bourbon's army should return to Lombardy within five days, and that the viceroy was actually set out to have a personal interview with Bourbon for that purpose. It was thought that the viceroy's intention was to turn the whole force of the war against the Venetians; for he refused to separate the Spanish foot, as he promised, from paciousness against friends and soes. At last Bourbon enteried the valley of Galcata, which belonged to the Florentines; where he received from Guicciardin sresh advices of the accommodation that the viceroy had come to, and that he was on his journey to meet him. But all was to no purpose; for he advanced to Santa Maria, in Bagno, though all the while he pretended to be extremely desirous of a treaty.

Bourbon's army, which proceeded with equal rap

25.05

Artful management of Guicciardin.

The interests of Florence and the pope were now separated, for the duke of Bourbon had no other option, than whether he should plunder Florence or Rome. Guicciardin managed so artfully, that he procured the marquis of Saluzzo's promise to march with the troops in the French pay, and part of the Venetians, to protect his countrymen the Florentines, who, on their part, agreed to give those troops pay from the time they entered Tuscany, and to come to no accommodation with the imperialists, even though the pope should. Florentines farther agreed to restore to the duke of Urbine, the fortresses of San Leo and Majuelo. That duke therefore, about the twenty-second of April, entered Tuscany. cardinal of Cortona, at this time, acted as a kind of deputy for the pope in Florence; and both armies being now in Tulcany, he left that city, that he might pay his compliments w the duke of Urbino, who was at hand, and intended to en-The cardinal was no fooner gone, than the Florentines, the youthful part of them particularly, tumultuoully demanded of the magistrates arms out of the arsenal; to defend themselves against all foreigners. This not being readily complied with, the infurgents seized upon the townhouse, in the principal square of the city, and obliged the magistrates to proclaim Hippolito and Alessandro de Medici rebels.

Disturbances of Florence appeased.

THE truth is, the Florentines, by this time, both despised and hated the pope, and wanted to return to their popular government. While they were deliberating on the means of effecting that, the duke of Urbino, and the marquis of Saluzzo, whose infantry was encamped in the plain near Florence, with the cardinal Cortona, Hippolito de Medici, and a great number of officers, entered the city, and putting fifteen hundred foot under arms, they marched in a body to the great fquare, which they immediately took possession: of, but were repulled in an attack they made upon the town-house. Upon this, the duke of Urbino ordered some Venetian soldiers to enter Florence; and dispositions were made for storming the town-house. Bozzola prefuming on his authority with the young nobility there, had repaired to them, and proposed terms of accommodation; but he hardly escaped with his life, and was going to advice the duke of Urbino to proceed to extremities, the duke resolved to try sair methods, and to promise a pardon to all the insurgents. This being offered, the tumult was accordingly composed; but Guicciardin was, by the cardinal of Cortona, blamed for his advice, because, had the place been stormed, all the enemies to the samily of the Medici must have been put to death; while he was, on the other hand, accused by the populace for having savoured that samily.

This dangerous commotion in Florence, gave the Venetians New neand the other confederates, a very indifferent opinion of the gcciations. attachment of the Florentines to the pope and his family; and they refused to proceed farther in Tuscany, without greater asfurances of the constancy of the Florentines in the confederacy; and that the Florentines should themselves become principals, and furnish ten thousand foot towards the common cause. The Florentines agreed to enter as principals; but referred themselves to the pope for the quota of troops they were to contribute. His holiness, afraid of farther exasperating the Florentines, pleaded to the allies the inability they were under for fatisfying so exorbitant a demand, and brought the French and Venetian ambassadors to agree to a new treaty. by which they were obliged to furnish him with large fums of money. The Venetian senate disapproved of their ambassador's conduct; and the French king was but very little disposed to fulfil the agreement. The state of Florence, however, was probably faved by the neighbourhood of the confederate army; for the duke of Bourbon confidering his own weakness and necessities, and that the success of any attempt against Florence was precarious, marched by the advice of the duke of Ferrara and Morone, who, being now released from prison, was become a strong imperialist, directly for Rome, which was now defenceless, the pope having disbanded all his troops. On the twenty-fixth of April he fet out for the territory of Arezzo, leaving all his cannon Bourbon and heavy baggage behind him; and before the pope knew proceeds to he was upon his march, he presented himself and his army Rome, before the gates of Rome. The Florentines had advice of Bourbon's march from Vitello, but it was too late; for not knowing that Bourbon had left his artillery and beavy baggage behind him, they fent five thousand troops to Rome, in hopes that they would come time enough to fuccour the pope, and ordered their whole army, and that of the ecclefiastical state, to follow. Renzo de Ceri was entrusted by the pope for the defence of Rome; and he was so confident of making an effectual refistance, that he assured his holiness that he had nothing to fear, and even hindered the merchants from earrying their effects to places of fecurity. A thick fog favoured.

nubich be /acks, but is killed.

voured him when he was met by Guicciardin. He endeavoured id perfuade him from making his approaches, but he desperately resolved, being unprovided of every thing, either to die or take the city. Perceiving that the German foot proceeded but flowly in the service, he snatched a ladder, and in person applied it to the walls; but was killed by a shot from a harque buz. His death. far from restraining the ardour of the ussailants; increased its and, with the loss of about one thousand men, they entered and facked the city, while the pope was obliged to withdraw to the castle of St. Angelo. The disorders committed by the foldiers were dieadful, and the booty they made incredible: They added infults to cruelty, and scotts to rapaciousness. Upon the news of Bourbon's death, his holiness, imagining that his troops, no longer animated by his implacable frint; might liften to an accommodation, demanded a parley; but, in the mean while, neglected all means for defence. The Spanish and German foot, sensible of this, and that they had nothing to fear, proceeded to enter and to plunder the richer quarters of the city. The Spanish and German cardinals, and the nobility in their interest, thought themselves safe, and removed neither their persons nor effects. But they were deceived; for they underwent the same fate as their antagonists. The Spaniards, as the Germans, made amends by plunder for their want of pay, but many of the latter being Lutherans, they had no manner of regard to the fanctity either of churches or churchmen. The former were plundered of all their furniture, and the latter were punished in their persons. Cardinals and bishops were ignominiously exposed upon affer with their legs and hands bound; and a great number of wealthy citizens, who were suspected of having secreted their effects and money, were tortured, many of them even to death, to oblige them to make discoveries. The paying an exorbitant ransom was the only safe-guard that the greatest Roman had; and the booty, in plunder and ranfoms, is faid to have amounted to about two millions and a half of ducats.

Disorders of bis army

THOUGH the Italians, in general, hated both the person The Floand power of the pope, yet they could not bear the thoughts rentines that barbarians should domineer in Rome; and the Florentines endeuvsur thought themselves obliged to rescue their countryman, and to relieve the head of the church, from his danger. Rangene advanced the pipe. with the light horse and eight hundred harquebusiers to Punts di Salara, in hopes to have the glory of delivering the pontiff; but understanding there that the Bourbonites were masters of Rome, he fell back to Otricoli, to join the rest of this army-He was greatly blamed for this retreat, it being thought thet, if he had entered Rome, he might have put the Bourbondri, who were all of them dispersed and intent on plunder, to the fword ... But the root of the pope's misfortunes lay in the duke of Urbine, who still continued to command the Venetions, and who fought all opportunities to protract time. The Swifs in the Kenetian service were so ill paid, that it was the third of May before they left Florence; and, by the dilatory measures. of the duke, it was the eleventh before they advanced to Creviette. Here Bozzelo laid a scheme for relieving the pope and the cardinals out of the castle of St. Angele; but it proved abortive by Bozzolo's falling from his horse. Mean while . the duke, of Urbino amused, himself in bringing about a new revolution in favour of his friends in Perugia; but at last, on the nineteenth of the same month, by slow degrees, he came to Nepi, from whence the pope was informed, by Guicciardin. of his approach. His holiness was now far advanced in an accommodation with the Bourbonite army; but on the prospect of his being relieved, he broke it off. Rangene offered to Backundertake the deliverance of the pope, if supported by the wardness duke of Urbino, who consented to the same; but invented so Urbino. many protexts and trifling excuses for delaying the execution, that the delign came to nothing. He even threatened to punish some of his officers who maintained that it was practicable to relieve the castle. In short, he at last declared he could not attempt it without fixteen thousand additional Swife to his army, ten thousand Italian musqueteers, three thousand pioneers, and forty pieces of cannon. He defired Guicciardin to inform his holiness, that he could not proceed till such a force was affembled.

w ho

IT was plain from this propolition, that the duke meant Retreat of to, do nothing, because it was not only impossible to bring the confefuch an army to the field, but a fresh army was then on its derates. tharch from Naples to reinforce the Bourbonites in Rome. After various confultations the confederate army retired to Montermely, shamefully abandoning the pope in his danger. The great prince of Orange, the founder of the Dutch republic X Had succeeded to the duke of Bourbon's command; and it. perhaps, was from the contempt he contracted for the pope and his religion, on this occasion, that he conceived ideas of the necessity for a reformation. The vicercy of Naples had been employed by the pope, when all other resources sailed, for an accommodation; and he readily undertook it, both because he was disposed to serve his holiness, and because he was in hopes to have supplanted the prince of Orange in his commands but when he came to Rome, far from having any authority with the Bourbonites, he found his life in danger, by his offering to take upon him to treat; and therefore the popel: MOD. HIST. VOL. XXXVI.

* This is an evident mistake; for 2 mm.

The pope redeems bim/elf from captivity.

was obliged, on the fixth of June, to come to a most dis graceful accommodation with his enemies. The terms were, that he should pay them four hundred thousand ducate, of which one hundred thousand were to be paid immediately, and the rest at stated times, but the whole within two months; and he was to remain a close prisoner till the first one hundred and fifty thousand were paid, together with the thirteen cardinals who were with him; after which they were to be removed to Gaeta, or Naples, there to wait for the determination of Charles: he likewise agreed to give hostages for the payment of the money, the castles of St. Angelo. Office. Civita Vecchia, and Civita Castellana, together with the cities of Piacenza, Parma, and Modena, and to submit to many other mortifications.

Bur his holiness, in this agreement, stipulated for more than he could perform. Andrew Doria being in possession of Civita Vecchia, refused to give it up without being paid his arrears; and the cities of Parma and Piacenza refused to submit to the Spaniards. The duke of Ferrara seized Modena, without refistance; and the Venetians, though they feemed to blame him, made themselves masters of Ravenus;

as Sigismondo Malatesta did of Rimini.

Revolution in Florence in faveler of government.

THE Florentines, on this occasion, experienced a new revolution. The cardinal of Cortona continued to govern that state in the pontiff's name; but he no sooner heard of his being made a prisoner, than, despairing of raising money from the popular the citizens, and loth to advance any himself, he summoned a general meeting; and he refigned into the hands of the citizens his power and authority, which they gladly accepted of, and thereby refumed their popular form of government All he bargained for was, that the pope's nephews might have liberty to remain at Florence in a private capacity; and that a general amnesty should be published; all which being obtained, he retired to Lucca. He was scarcely arrived there, when he repented of his pufillanimous precipitate conduct, and fent messengers to prevail on the governors the citadels of Pisa and Leghorn, who were friends to the Medici samily, to keep possession of those forts. rentines, having foreseen what would happen, had been before hand with him, and partly by perfuation, partly by money had got the places into their own hands. The Florential people, thus having almost miraculously recovered their is berty and constitution, chose Nicolo Capponi gonfalonier & justice for one year, with a liberty of being confirmed for three. He was a person highly respectable by his blood, but more by his wildom and virtue. He was zealous for the freedom of his country; but endeavoured to persuade his fellow. citizens to avoid that democratical spirit which had so often endangered or overturned their constitution.

THE Florentines were too much exasperated when they re- The Meflected on the vast sums they had expended in the quarrels of dici bated the Medici family, to hearken to the voice of reason. enemies of that house calculated, that it had cost them five hundred thousand ducats to defend the duchy of Urbino for the boly see; that pope Leo's wars with the French king had cost them as much; that they had paid three hundred thoufand ducats to the viceroy of Naples and the imperial generals: about the time of Clement's creation; and that they had expended fix hundred thousand in the war against Charles; so that, upon the whole, they calculated that the pope's quarrels, which were entirely foreign to their own, had cost them about two millions of ducats in a few years; (a fum that no crowned head in Europe could have advanced in so shore a time) without receiving from it the smallest benefit either of power or revenue. The recollection of all this rendered the Florentines quite outtageous against the partizans of the Medici, whom they bitterly persecuted on every occasion. They went so far as to demolish all the arms and marks of distinction belonging to that house throughout their city, and even proceeded to appropriate their private estates for reimbursing themselves.

THE Bourbon army (for it properly can go under no other Mileritis of name) still remained in Rome; and the sweets of plunder had Rome contains extinguished all discipline amongst them. They now listened tinued. to nothing but the dictates of rapaciousness. They disregarded the prince of Orange, while the viceroy of Naples, and the marquis of Guafto, were obliged to fly from Rome to escape their fury. This intemperate behaviour faved the pope from Twenty-two thousand regular troops were asfembled in Rome, and its neighbourhood; and they might have possessed themselves of all the ecclesiastical state; but their views were confined to plunder entirely, and their riotous manner of life, together with the heats of the feafon. introduced amongst them pestilential diseases, which commumicated themselves even to Florence, and swept off prodigious numbers. The inactivity of the Bourbon army, and the wheath of its general, prevailed with the French king to renew Dis negotiations for a general league against Charles in Raly. Ento which the king of England readily entered; but failing: an the performance or his engagement, and finish a substitution a substitution in money, and Francis linked himself with a street of taked in in the performance of his engagements, they were converted. Finetians and the duke of Milan. It was agreed, to take in the pay of their confederacy ten thousand Swiss and ten thoufand Italian foot, besides ten thousand French, that were to be commanded by Pietro Navarra, five hundred lances, and eighteen pieces of artillery, the whole to be commanded by

-.. . .

Lautree, at the defire of the king of England.

THE partizans of the Medici family continued still powerfederacy. ful in Florence; and though the emperor offered to take the new modelled state under his protection, at their own request made by the duke of Ferrara, they entered into the new confederacy, and obliged themselves to keep in pay five thoufand foot, which highly exasperated Charles. The pestilence at last communicating itself to the army of the league, it retired first to Orvieto, and afterwards to Castello della Piew; and being apprehensive they might be attacked by the imperialists, it was with difficulty they were prevented from taking shelter in the state of Florence. The pope now despaired of relief; and all the favour he could obtain, was leave to remain in the castle of St. Angelo, and to apply to Charles for favour by the cardinal of Farnese, who declined the legation Lautree at last, in the beginning of July, proceeded to Italy, the king of England having advanced valt furns for support of the league. The armaments on the part of the confederates were expected to be more powerful than any that had been yet made; and Lautree had the title of captain-general of the league. His motions encouraged the Venetians and the Milanese to bestir themselves in Lombardy; but they were repulsed by Antonio de Leva, who likewise defeated the Swift governor of Mus, as he was advancing to join the French THE relief of the pope from his confinement in the caffle

Distinulation of the of St. Angelo, became now a serious matter with all the powers of Europe. The emperor hearing of his captivity, riemperor. diculously put himself into mourning, yet continued him in prison: upon which the kings of England and France fent formal ambassies to demand from Charles the deliverance of his holiness. This produced only vague promises; and had it not been for too much exasperating the other powers of Europe, particularly England, he would have ordered him to be carried to Spain; but Charles was intimidated by the confederacy that had been formed; and, in compliment to Henry, he ordered his holiness to be restored to his liberty, and put in possession of the towns and places that had been taken from him. This was far from giving peace to Christendem. The kings of Prance and England, though > their views in making war were very different, prescribed to Gharles the preliminaries for a treaty; the chief articles of > > which

which were, his accepting of two millions of ducats in lieu of all his demands; his fending home the French king's children, and suffering the affairs of Italy to remain as they were. Charles rejected those terms, and made preparations for an Italian war with more vigour than ever. The imperial army in Rome continued still indolent and inactive, and was daily wasting away by the plague, which drove the prince of Orange to Sienna, where he was obliged to employ his authority and some force to preserve the imperial interest.

HITHER TO Charles had proceeded no farther in the libe- Disorders ration of the pope, than by pretending to iffue orders out. of the But his troops refused to obey; and the pope, unable to raise any Bourbonmore money than the first payment of one hundred and fifty ites. thousand ducats, or to give any fresh security for the payment of the rest, they threatened to hang up all the hostages. At 12st, however, they moved from Rome, as it were for the change of air; and, after plundering Terni and Narni, they prepared to make an irruption into the Florentine dominions. This was the more practicable on account of the weakness of the confederate army, the greatest part of which was assembled in the Mildnese. The Florentines were sensible of their danger, and had raised for their defence eighty men at arms. one hundred and fifty light horse, and sour thousand soot, all of them in excellent order, and punctually paid, which was far from being the case with the troops of their allies. The duke of Urbino's dilftory motions were now openly blamed by all the parties in the confederacy; and the Venetians themfelves, suspecting him of treachery, had put his wife and son under arrest at Venice. It was thought, however, at this time, that the imperial army in Italy was reduced to ten thousand foot, which encouraged the confederates to make fome motions in the Romagna, where they took the abbey of San Pieere, and some other inconsiderable places. Afterwards the duke of Urbino took up his quarters at Narni, as the French did at Bevagna; while the Florentine infantry, commanded by Oratio Baglioni, having no quarters assigned them, took and plundered the town of Montefalco, and afterwards the Breffian. Alike ineffectual were the operations of the confederates in Affairs of Lombardy, till the arrival of Lautrec in Piedmont, in the be-Lombarginning of August. His first undertaking was against Bosco, dy. which he obliged to furrender, though it was garrisoned by one thousand imperialists. About the same time Andrew Doria, who was now in the pay of Francis, obliged Genou again to fubmit to the French. Those successes gave given spirit to the affairs of the league under Lautre, whole army was the affembled; and he laid fiege to the important city of angles.

dria, which he took; but he was obliged to put it into the hands of the duke of Milan. The city of Milan was, at this time, possessed by Antonio de Leva, who dispatched one of his officers, Relevoiolo, to defend Pavia, which Lautrec instantly invested, and took about the middle of September. It is said, the remembrance of the defeat and difgrace which the French had suffered before that city, made them treat the inhabitants with vaft inhumanity.

Dauger of

THE Florentines, at this time, confidered themselves as be-Florence, ing in the most imminent danger. The great force of the league lay in Lembardy; and their dominions were exposed to the imperial army in the Romagna and the ecclefiastical flate. Lautree had been foured by being forced to relign Aleffandria to the confederates, and was therefore glad of an opportunity to ble them. After the taking of Pavia, the Florentines formed him to march forward to the Romagna, while the dove of Milan and the Venetians infifted upon his belieging Milan. Lautree complied with the Venetians, pretending that his orders were first to deliver the pope from his prison, and then to attempt the conquest of Naples. It was thought that Lautree had private orders from Francis not to put Sforza in possession of all the Milanese, but to keep it as a bait for the emperor, during the negociation, which was still in dependence.

Obstinacy of the .mperer.

THE loss of Pavia and Alessandria, far from mollifying Charles, rendered him more obstinate than ever, and he rose in his demands; one of which was, that the Florentines should pay him thirty thousand ducats for the non observance of their engagements. At last, Lautree, having concerted measures with Doria and the Venetians, for attacking Naples by sea, passed the Po; but received private orders from Francis to ad with great coldness, so that he threw all the impediments he could into the affairs of the confederacy. He brought the duke of Ferrara, however, to agree to become a party in the league, which he did upon conditions very advantageous to himself and his family; and his example was followed by the The flowness of Lautrec's marches marquis of Mantua. again endangered Florence; for the the duke of Urbino and the marquis of Saluzzo were now in Tuscany, their armies were so ill paid, that, if the Imperialists had advanced, they must have retired under the walls of Florence, the duke of Urbino's troops not exceeding three thousand men. Lautree remained all this time near Parma and Piacenza; but the apprehenfions of his advancing to free the pope, now rendered Charles in earnest about his deliverance: tho' his terms continued to be so unfavourable to the pontiff, that the negociation was spun put to a great length to no purpose. His holiness pressed Lautree to hasten his march, protesting that he should be obliged, if he did not, to accept of the emperor's terms, hard as they were. But Charles, who was apprehensive of a revolution in Naples, partly freed him from that disagreeable neceffity, by ordering Moncada to finish the negociation, and to restore the pontiss to his liberty, which was done on the last day of October. The terms were, that his holiness should observe a strict neutrality between Charles and his enemies; and that he should deposit in the emperor's hands Osiia, Civita Vecchia, Civita Castellana, and the citadel of Ferli; and give hostages for the performance of the treaty. He was likewise to pay, in the whole, about three hundred and fifty thougand ducats amongst the Spanish and German soldiers; and to grant the emperor liberty to raise money out of the ecclesiastical revenues of Spain and Naples. His holiness was reduced to great difficulties, and obliged to purfue some very simoniacal meafures to enable him to fulfil his contract. He even distrusted Mencada so much, that he stole in disguise out of the castle. and posted to Orvieto, before he could think himself in safety. Upon the pope's deliverance, Lautre: advanced to Bologna, where he spent twenty days, and strongly solicited the pope to enter into the confederacy; but he met only with evalive The pope answers. The negociations for peace, however, still went on. delivered. and Charles appeared willing to make up matters with the Florentines; but the negociation proving ineffectual, war was denounced on the part of the confederacy against the emperor, who thereupon ordered the French, the Venetian, and Flogentine ambassadors to be put under arrest.

ALL hopes of an accommodation being now over, Lautree March of lest Bologna, and began his march for Naples by the way of Lautrec to the Ramagna and the marquifate of Ancona, greatly against Naples. the will of the Florentines and the pope, who pressed him to march by the way of Sienna, that their territories might be covered from the Imperialists, who still remained in the country near Rome. But Lautree by this time had entered Naples, and waited for the coming up of the Florentine foot, which went by the name of the black bands, whom he esteemed to be the best troops then in Italy. While those bands were on their march, they took and plundered Aquila; but on the zad of March, having joined the consederate army, they and a body of French were fent, under Pietro Navarra, to beliege Melfi. The emulation between the Florentines and the French was so great, that they proceeded to a small breach they had made without any order, and so irregulatly, that they were taken on their flanks, and repulsed with some loss. Next morn-

Lla

the Flo-

rentines

¿bere.

morning they renewed the affault, and took the town by flores. putting all the pealants and townfmen to the fword; while the prince of Melfi himself retired to the citadel, which, in a short time, he was obliged to surrender. All the garrison, except the prince and a few of his officers, were killed, and the whole loss of the besieged amounted to three thousand This success was followed by others of still greater ceffes, and men. bravery of importance; and, had not the confederate fleet under Doria been dispersed by a storm, the conquest of Naples might have been completed that fummer. Lautres, however, formed the flege of Naples, in which the Florentine troops distinguished themselves to great advantage; tho, not being supported by a proper cavalry, they suffered much, and grew more caution; but Lautree had not a naval force to make his undertaking good. Doria had recretly resolved to fall off from the league, and the Venctions were employed in other conquests. disadvantages, but above all the diminution of the Florentine troops from three thousand to two thousand, disheartened the French. Lautree had, again and again, pressed the pope to enter into the league, which he feemed inclinable to do, and to delift from all his pretentions upon Florence, provided the Venetians would restore to him Ravenna, which they resuled to do; but his holiness recovered Rimini, and, under pretence of acting as a mediator, he still declined acceding to the confederacy.

Policy of the pope.

THE true cause of his backwardness was soon known to be the earnest desire he had to recover the dominion of Florence to himself and his family. Ever fince his deliverance out of the castle of St. Angelo, he had been secretly carrying on intrigues in that city, and had fent a Florentine prelate to manage his concerns there, protesting, that he had laid aside all designs upon their freedom; and that all he begged was that he and his family should not be exposed to insults; but remain in quiet possession of their external ornaments and marks of honour. The Florentines were to distrustful of his intentions, that they refused audience to his ambassador, which obliged his holiness to have recourse to the mediation of the This expedient proved equally unfuccessful; French king. for the Florentines still appeared averse to treat with him. At last, he applied to Lautree to restore Fabio Petrucci to the government of Sienna, and to remove from thence the friends of Florence; but the friendship of the Florentines was at this time of so much importance to Lautrec, that he refused to concern himself in the matter. His holiness then endeavoured to prevail with Pirroda da Castel di Piero, on pretext of some private grievances, to surprise Sienna with eight hundred men, and

and some exiles he had collected at Chius: but the vigilance of the Florentines defeated this design also; for they made the viscount of Turenne sensible, that the pope had nothing in his eve but to gratify his private ambition, and distress the Florentines, by obtaining possession of Sienna, which, by its situation, would have greatly forwarded his views.

THE fiege of Naples still went on; but Doria now declared Siege of that he was entered into the emperor's service; and by his de- Naples, fection, together with the plague and the diseases that raged and death in the French camp, their troops were reduced to a handful. of Lauwhich must have been intirely cut in pieces, had it not been trec. for the valour of the Florentine auxiliaries. At last, Lautrec, who was an excellent officer, dying, the marquis of Saluzzo, a general far inferior to him in abilities, succeeded to his command. Unable longer to continue the fiege of Naples, he drew off his troops towards Aversa; but being briskly attacked in his retreat by the Imperialists under the prince of Orange, he was obliged to yield himself a prisoner; and to agree, that the French under his command should return to their own Ruinof the country without their colours, arms, horses, or effects; and French in that the Florentine and other Italian infantry should not serve Naples. against the emperor for fix months: and thus all the mighty preparations and successes of the French, in the kingdom of Naples, came to nothing.

THE Imperialists all this time maintained their ground in Affairs of Lombardy, though under great disadvantages, through the Lombargood conduct of Antonio de Leva; but Doria got possession of dy and Genea, which he restored to its liberty. The Florentines, ne- Naples. vertheless, continued firm to their engagements with France and England, and confented to pay one third of the troops that served under Renzo da Ceri, who was still in possession of fome places in the kingdom of Naples. All parties were now tired of the war, and entered upon a fresh treaty for peace; but, in the mean time, the Imperialists under the prince of Orange retook Aquila and Matrice, which last place had been abandoned by Camillo Pardo, who likewise carried off with him the money advanced by the Florentines for its defence. The pope, all this while, pretended to breathe nothing but peace; and offered, if Ravenna and Cervia were restored to him, to make up all matters in dispute with the Florentines, who still continued to supply Renzo with men and money. Their firmness induced Charles to listen to the proposals of his bolines, whose views continued to be fixed on the recovering his authority in Florence. He plainly perceived, that he could not bring the French to be subservient to his designs there, and he hoped every thing from Charles. Braccio Baglioni had

A. D. 1529.

claims

the Florentines pope,

Firmels of claims upon Perugia, in which he was favoured by the pope. out of hatred to the Florentines; and that induced his rival Malatefla to leave the service of his holiness, and to enter against the into that of the French and the Florentines. The pope did all he could to prevent this defection from his interests; but the Florentines thought him so useful an ally, that they gave him two thousand crowns salary, and the command of one thoufand toot, besides providing for his sons, and giving him other lucrative places and pensions. He, on his part, engaged, upon the Florentines paying two hundred foot for the defence of Perugia, which they likewise took into their protection, to have always one thousand of his own troops at their service, even though he should be abandoned by the French.

who gains te:la.

THE pope complained bitterly, on this occasion, to the over Mala- French king, that the Florentines had debauched from his fervice a subject and a state belonging to the holy see; and Francis endeavoured to persuade Malatesta to continue in the pontiff's pay. But all was in vain; for Malatesta obstinately adhered to his engagements with the Florentines, who now openly affilted him, in defiance of his holiness. Capponi continued to be still gonfalonier of Florence, and endeavoured, by wisdom and moderation, to preserve the liberties of his country; but without doing any thing harsh or unjust to the adherents of the house of Medici. This conduct was disliked by the enemies of that house, who continued implacable against it; and, after two years of Capponi's office were expired, they caballed against his continuing in it for a third. Capponi still maintained his credit with the wifest and worthiest part of the citizens, and with their privity he entered into a private correspondence with the pontiff, to divert him from coming to any violent resolutions against the state. The correspondence, however, was di'covered to Capponi's enemies, by his dropping a letter which he had received from Rome; and which was fo maliciously represented by some of the members of the higher Revolution council, that the youths of Florence role in arms, seized on in their go- the town-house, and, calling the magistrates and citizens wernment. together in a tumultuous manner, they first put the gonfalonier under arrest, and deprived him of his office: a sentence which was ratified by the upper council. After this, the gonfalonier was tried before the proper judges for corresponding with the enemies of the state; but, being acquitted by them with great honour, he was attended to his palace by the nobility and chief citizens of Florence in a body. He was succeeded in his office of gonfalonier by Francesco Carducci, 2 person of very inscrior qualities to him.

THE duke of Urbins still continued to command the troops Affairs of of the confederates in Lombardy, and had by this time cleared Lombarhimself of all suspicion at Venice. He had, in conjunction dy. with the French general St. Paul, and the duke of Milan, recovered almost the whole duchy, except Milan and Como, which were still maintained by Antonio de Leva, who, about this time, recovered Novara; and, though disabled by the gout, lameness, rheumatism, and other diseases, he surprised. defeated, and took prisoner St. Paul at Landriano. This defeat obliged the French to evacuate almost all the Wilanese, and to retire to Lodi. But the negociations for peace became now more ferious than ever, and the chief powers at war feemed fincerely disposed towards an accommodation. pope had behaved so artfully, that though he was despised and distrusted by all parties, yet his friendship became necessary to all of them; but the emperor outbid all the rest. A treaty was concluded between them at Barcelona, by which his holi- A peace ness obliged himself to grant the imperial troops a free passage through the ecclesiastical state. Charles, on the other hand, engaged to reinstate Alessandro de Medici, the son of Lorenzo de Medici, the late nominal duke of Urbino, in all his family rights, and power over the Florentine state, as exercifed before the expulsion of his family; his holiness promising to pay the necessary expences attending that restitution. The pope was again to be put into the possession of Cervia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggio, and Rubiera, without prejudice, however, to the rights of the empire and those of the holy see. The pope was to grant the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to Charles, together with a vast number of ecclesiastical immunities and privileges in that kingdom; and, in case Francesco Sforza was, upon trial, found to have been guilty of high treason against his imperial majesty, the duchy of Milan was to be disposed of, by the joint confent of both parties. Other articles, not so material to our present purpose, were likewise stipulated between them; and, to bind the whole accommodation, Charles agreed to give his natural daughter, Margaret, in marriage to Alessandro de Medici, with an an-to the prenuity of twenty thousand ducats, and an investiture of all the judice of secular greatness of the Medici family. It is remarkable, that the Florenthough Charles, when this peace was concluded, did not know tines. of the advantageous turn his affairs had taken in Lombardy, yet he readily confirmed the articles on the 29th of June, and folemnly swore to the observance of them before the high altar of the cathedral church of Barcelona.

THIS peace was not the only blow the Flerentines received at this time; for while Francis was giving them the strongest assurances of his adherence to his league with them, he actually entered into a negociation at Cambray for an accommodation with Charles. The conferences were managed by the French king's mother and the lady Margaret, fifter to the emperor, affilted by ambaffadors from England and the pope. On the 5th of August the treaty was concluded and published. The terms were, that the French king's children should be released, on payment of a large sum to Charles, who was to be put into possession of all that the French held either in the duchy of Milan, or the kingdom of Naples. likewise to assist Charles in obliging the Venetians to restore the towns they had taken from him in Puglia, and they and the Florentines had four months allowed them for acceding to the treaty.

subo are by the French king.

IT must be confessed, that the whole of this negociation abandoned was differenceful to Francis, who, in other respects, was a generous open-hearted prince. But, indeed, the nature of the times did not much favour the exercise of those virtues in sovereigns. Francis seemed to be ashamed of what he had done; and, after the peace had been concluded in his name, he came to Cambray, where the ambassadors of the consederates, particularly those of Florence, still remained. He artfully declined giving them all audience at once; but taking each separately, he apologized to all for the necessity he was under, on account of his children, to conclude the peace. As to the Florentines, he seemed greatly concerned for their interest, because they had depended on his good faith. He pretended, to their ambassadors, that he never would see them oppressed; and promised to lend them forty thousand crowns, to affift them in defending their liberties; and gave leave for Stefans Colonna, an officer of reputation in his service, to enter into their pay. But our author observes, that the promise of the money vanished into smoke.

Charles tilities Acainst them,

EVERY thing now tended towards the great catastrophe of begins hof- the Florentine liberty. Charles had fent before him two thoufand Spanish foot, to wait for his arrival at Genoa; and no fooner had he figured the convention with the pope, than he ordered the prince of Orange, who was then at Aquila, on the confines of Naples, reviewing his troops, to march into the Florentine territories. The prince detested the commission; but was obliged to obey, though he threw all the rubs he could in the way to render it abortive. On the last of July he repaired to Rome, to concert with his holiness the operations of the campaign. Many difficulties occurred, and the prince was fornetimes on the point of breaking off the conferences. He pleaded, that he had no money; and the pontiff, with great difficulty, agreed to advance thirty thousand ducate, and forty thousand more in a short time, upon the prince's undertaking to drive Malatesta Baglione out of Perugia, and to reduce that city to the obedience of the church; and then to proceed against Florence, where he was to re-establish the authority of the Medici family. The prince, having now no farther pretexts for delay, affembled his army, which confifted of three thousand German, and four thousand Italian, foot; the chief officers under him being Pierlugi da Farnese, the count di San Secondo, colonel Martio, and Schiarra Colonna. and lands He was to be followed by the Spanish foot under the marquis at Genoa. of Guasta in Naples; and the pope lent him three pieces of cannon, and other artillery, out of the castle of St. Angelo.

THE Florentines were far from being daunted, as the pape had expected, at the march of the prince, and appeared to be unanimously resolved to desend their liberties and independency, when advice came of Charles having arrived at Genoa, on the 12th of August, with a large fleet, on board of which were nine thousand foot and one thousand horse, all veteran troops; while at the same time Fx in, one of his generals, marched into Lombardy with eight thousand Germans. The Florentines were well apprized of the deligns on foot against them; but could not bring themselves to believe, that the immemorial hatred between the popes of Rome and the empetors of Germany were so far extinguished, as that Charles could eafily behold Florence become again subject to the holy The boafted confederacy was now reduced to the Florentines, the Venetians, and the duke of Ferrara, the duke of Milan having entered into a private negociation with his holines. The Venetians fought only to secure what they had acquired; and the duke of Ferrara was fure of having good terms, but held out till he could get the best. The Florenrines, alone, acted with good faith to themselves and their al-That they might not be wanting in point of prudence. as foon as they heard that Charles was arrived in Italy, they deputed four of their most considerable citizens to attend him as their ambassadors, and fairly to represent the hardships they The Venetians were offended at this step of the were under. Florentines, who were likewise blamed by the duke of Ferrara, because it looked like a separate negociation. That duke, however, imitated their example; and the Venetians themselves consented that the duke of Milan should make the best. terms he could with the emperor.

THOUGH the Florentines proceeded with great wildom and Courage decency, yet they were not fully apprized of the connexions and conbetween Charles and the pope. The reader, perhaps, needs dust of the

not be informed that the divorce was now in agitation bes tween Henry VIII. and queen Catherine, aunt to Charles, who had treated the pope so favourably as he did, that he might prevail with him to refuse the divorce, and to excommunicate Henry, if he should marry another wife, while Catherine was alive. His holiness was sensible how much this affair concerned the house of Austria, and had made the reinstating the Medici family to their power in Florence the price of his com-The Florentine ambaffadors acquitted themselves to admiration, and with great dignity. Repairing to Genee. where Charles was, they congratulated him on his arrival, and discharged their commission; but without making any mean submissions. They were answered by Charles's first minister. that it did not confift with the imperial dignity to treat with the ambassadors of a subject state, who had joined the enemies of its lawful fovereign, and therefore had forfeited its privileges; and that Charles expected they should obtain a commission for a treaty with the pontiff, after which he would perhaps deign to hear what they had to propose. bassadors reported this answer to their principals at Florence. who sent them an ample commission to treat with Charles but not with the pontiff; ordering them, at the fame time. to admit of no proposals from him, and not to visit the cardinal de Medici, who was one of the ambassadors attending: Charles on behalf of his holinefs. For those reasons, when Charles, in the beginning of September, went to Piacenza, herefused to suffer the Florentine ambassadors to enter that city: Even this severe treatment did not discourage the Florentines. from making preparations for a gallant defence. They took into their pay the warlike abbot of Farfa and two: hundred. horse, and sent him money for raising one thousand foot, which was, by the pope's orders, intercepted near Bracciane: the abbot, however, foon made reprifals, by feizing the person of cardinal Santa Croce, one of the ambassadors the pope fent to Charles, and putting him under arrest, which obliged: his holiness to refund the money. They had cast their eyes. upon Don Ercele da Este, the duke of Ferrara's eldest son, to be captain-general of their troops, and had fent him levymoney for one thousand foot; but the duke of Ferrara prevailed upon his fon not to accept the command; and he was mean enough even to detain the money, though he fent his cavalry into the Florentine service.

His holiness having, by those proceedings, entered into a state of hostilities with the Florentines, and treated Maketesa Baglioni as a rebel, Charles gave orders for Antonia de Leva to enter Lembardy at the head of all the Spanish forces, and offered fered to land them at Spetia in the Geneese dominions, as being Progress of near Florence; but the pope, looking on that territory as his the war own, was far from encouraging so powerful an invasion; and against therefore it was resolved to begin the operations on the side them. of whe Ranagna, under the prince of Orange. He accordingly directed his march against Spelle, where the best of his officers, Giovanni de Urbino, was killed by a shot from the place, while he was reconnoiting it. The garrison, which consisted of five hundred soot and twenty horse, was commanded by Lione Baglioni, a natural brother of Malatesta, who made a cowardly surrender of the place, upon a single battery being opened against it; the garrison capitulating to march out without any arms but their swords, and as many effects as they could carry, and not to serve against Charles for three months.

THE bishop of Tarbe was at this time in Tuscany, as am- Dissimulabaffador from France, and encouraging the few remains of tion of the confederacy, particularly the Florentines, to hold out to the Francis. last, because his master was preparing to send a great force to their affishance. The intention of Francis, by those declarations, was to multiply the difficulties of Charles, every day producing fresh doubts and obstacles to the execution of the treaty between them. Though he had no intention to favour the Florentines, yet he thought he might more readily recover his children by spiriting up an opposition to him in Tuscany. He succeeded so far, that the war was renewed between Charles, on the one part, and the duke of Milan and the Venetians, on the other, in Lombardy. The pope, being afraid that, by this newly rekindled war, he might be disappointed in his views upon Tufcany, interposed as a mediator with all parties; and Charles, alarmed by the progress of the Turks in Hungary and Austria, became every day more pliable. Venetians, on the other hand, always frugal of their money, had laid up their fleet, and had fent orders to their general. the duke of Urbine, to act upon the defensive in the Bresciane. In the mean while, the active Antonio de Leva, whom age and infirmities had now reduced to be carried in a litter around men's shoulders, took Pavia, almost without resistances (while the marquis of Mantua, who was now in the imperial cpay, was making preparations for belieging the duke of Milan in. Gremona, which was succoured by the Venetians sinch decaded. the neighbourhood of the imperialists. 18 Sec. 18 8 1955

AFTER the prince of Orange had taken Spelle, being joined Progress of by the Spanish foot under the marquis de Guasto, he advanced the prince against Perugia, where he had entered into a secret negocial of Orange, tion with Malatesta to persuade him to submit to the popular As the views of his holiness against Perugian course at that.

time no farther, than that the inhabitants, and the garrison, which confisted of three thousand Florentine foot, might not interrupt his designs upon Florence, he offered Malatesta very advantageous terms; and that not only his estate and effects should be preserved, but that he should be at liberty to withdraw with the garrison, to the desence of the Florentines; and that none of his enemies should be admitted into Perusia. Malatesta would have gladly accepted of those terms; but, out of a point of honour, he declared he would not, unless with the consent of the Florentines. To bring the latter to agree to them, he informed them, that he could not defend Perugia, without a fresh supply of one thousand foot, and unless they would cover the neighbourhood of Perugia with the rest of their troops, which, in fact, it was not possible for them to do, without leaving their own capital defenceless. Malatesta then represented to them, that, in all probability, if an accommodation was not effected, the prince of Orange would advance with his main army directly against Florence, and leave Perugia to the mercy of the pope, who had troops of his own sufficient to distress, if not to reduce it.

latefa.

MALATESTA's suggestions were fully debated at Floabout Ma- rence, where the danger their garrison was in of being intercepted, and some distrust they had of his fidelity, prevailed on the magistracy to resolve upon granting him leave to accept of the terms proposed by the pope and the prince of Orange. They accordingly, on the 6th of September, fent a messenger with leave to Malatesta to close with the terms proposed to him; but by all means to withdraw his garrison to Florence. Before this messenger arrived at Perugia, the prince of Orange had made so great a progress, that Malatesta had agreed to the terms; and the prince, that the garrison might receive no interruption in returning to Florence, had agreed to make a halt of two days to favour their retreat. It was the 12th of December before the Florentines marched out of Perugin, which evacuated, they did with such expedition, that they arrived the same day at Cortona; and the Imperialists still advancing, the whole war was in a manner contracted to the neighbourhood of Florence.

Perugia

THE Venetians and the duke of Ferrara, well knowing that the pope's principal object was to re-establish his family in Florence, were all this while exciting the Florentines to perfevere in their own desence, in hopes of obtaining better terms for themselves; nor, in the end, were they deceived in their schemes, though they deceived the Florentines in all the magnificent promises they made them. The prince of Orange Cortona, was at this time bufy in the flege of Cortona, which proceeded but flowly, though the place had but seven hundred in garrison; whereas it required one thousand to make an effectual desence. Antonio Francesco Albizi then commanded for the Florentines in Arezzo, where the garrison was very strong. Being apprehensive of the fate of Cortona, and that, after taking it, the prince of Orange would certainly march directly against Florence, and thereby cut off all communication between that city and Arezzo, he resolved to withdraw the garrison, and to leave no more than one hundred soldiers for the defence of the castle; but being arrived at Fighini, he had an interview with Malatesta, who persuaded him to send back one thousand of his men to Arezzo.

In the mean while, on the 17th of September, the prince of Orange continued the siege of Cortona, though not very briskly; but the garrison, despairing of relief either from Florence or Arezzo, furrendered the place, and agreed to pay to the prince twenty thousand ducats to exempt them from being plundered. The example of Cortona was tollowed by Arezzo, which is which the garrison abandoned; and the inhabitants surren-taken; as_ dered, on condition of being taken under the imperial pro- is Arezzo. tection, and not to return under the government of the Flarentines, as imagining that they must then return to be subject to the house of Medici. But Charles had now declared, that he would hear of no terms, nor admit the Florentine ambassadors to treat, unless the Medici were re-established in their power over the Florentines; and the prince of Orange declared, that he must proceed to extremities, if that re-establishment was not complied with.

IT is amazing that the Florentines had the courage and The Floconstancy to withstand, as they did, so many powerful enemies, rentines and the practices of so many treacherous allies. Italy con-abandoned fidered the reduction of Florence as the price of her peace; and by their every prince and state within it thought themselves concerned allies. either in opposing or forwarding the favourite view of his holines; but all for the same end, their own interest. His holiness thought no gratification too great, that could acquire a friend or remove an enemy: even petty lords availed themfelves of the distresses of the Florentines, by receiving money for their levies, and then going over to their enemies. The army of the prince of Orange now confifted of four thoufand five hundred Spanish and German foot, all of them excellent troops, and about fix thousand Italians, three hundred men at arms, and five hundred light horse; but it was miserably provided in cannon, fo that the prince was obliged to apply to the Siennese. The aversion which that people had for the house of Medici was equal to that of the Florentine and though they were in no condition to refuse the prince's demands, yet they proceeded in their compliance with him reluctantly and flowly. With this melancholy prospect before their eyes, the Florentines still continued to treat. By gaining time, they had leifure to fortify their city; and they were in hopes that the imperial army must moulder away, or be disbanded for want of money. But, above all, they were still in hopes of being able to mollify Charles, and had chosen four new ambassadors to treat with him.

Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI. M m

Sugge?ions against tien.

But they foon found all their expectations vain, and that they must stand or fall by themselves. Nothing was so much talked of in Italy, both amongst their friends and allies, as their ingratitude towards the house of Medici, who had raised them to so high a pitch of grandeur; who, by their private fortunes, had enriched their state, adorned their city, and polished their manners; who had ruled them with such gentleness and justice, that their superiority was not felt, who never had been accused but upon groundless suspicions and unsupported clamour; and who never had had an enemy but those who were enemies to the peace of their country, and the order of government. The Florentines, on the other hand, having but newly recovered their liberty, were passionately fond of it; but they perceived that they could not enjoy it, and manifest their aversion to the house of Medici at the same time. They, therefore, in a general meeting, or parliament, resolved to agree to re-admit the family of Medici, They nego- and to treat with the pope, provided their liberties were not

the pope;

ciate with to be affected, or the popular form of their government altered. Deputies were fent to fignify this resolution to the pope, and others were fent to the prince of Orange, who had expressed great kindness for their state, provided the Medici The pope behaved towards the family was restored to it. ambassadors with his usual politeness, diffimulation, and caution. He protested, that he had no design upon the liberties of Florence; that he had no difference with their Rate, farther than as being an ally to the emperor, who was the direct lord of it; and that the best method they could pursue was to leave their interests intirely in his hands, and to trust to his honour, being determined to employ all his credit with Charles in their favour, and to do them more good offices than they had reason to expect at his hands. The Florentines, to put his professions to a trial, requested that he would procure an immediate stop to be put to the march of the imperial army; which the crafty pontiff absolutely refused to do, as well knowing to what the request tended. As to the prince of Orange, he pretended, that, being under the emperor's orders, he could do nothing of himself. Notwithstanding this, the slowness of his motions were very savourable to the Fig-rentines.

THE latter, all this while, continued their endeavours to but fortify fortify their city; but found it impracticable to do it effec- their city. tually, before the prince of Orange, who, on the 24th of September, lay at Monte Varchi in the Val d'Arno, eight miles distant from Florence, could come before it. They received likewise intelligence, that Ramazzotto, a papal general, had advanced from the Bolognese, and had entered the vale of Mugello with three thousand men, in order to proceed to Prate; fo that their city was in danger of being thut up by its enemies on all fides. The apprehension of this drove many of the inhabitants out of Florence; and the council of ten, who had the management of the war, gave it as their unanimous opinion, that the Florentines had no chance for fafety, but to fend a free and unconditional offer of submission to the will of the fovereign pontiff. That council, however, being fubordinate to the supreme council, the affair was laid before them, who, with the gonfalonier at their head, and supported by the partizans of popular government, and the youth of the city, condemned the resolution, and prepared for a vigorous defence.

THE prince of Orange, without shewing any resentment Slowness at the Siennese for not expediting the march of their artillery, of the pretended he could not advance farther than Feghini and An-prince of cifa, which he did on the 27th, before the arrival of the ar-Orange. tillery from Sienna; but it was thought, that, if he had proceeded on the 28th, which was the day the disagreement happened between the supreme council and the council of ten, he might have taken possession of Florence, even without artillery. His flowness raised the Florentines from their despondency; and they worked fo incessantly upon their fortifications, that, by the 4th of October, they were judged to be in a state of defence. The citizens became now unanimous to hold out to the last; and their resolution was confirmed when they received advice that Ramazzotto, whose troops were without money, and without discipline, having plundered the Mugello, was returned to the Bolognese, where he purchased from his foldiers all their plunder.

The pope, from the late applications made to him by the Florentines, and the new deputation they had ordered to Charles, imagined that they were disposed to make an absolute furrender of their government into his hands, and sent the archbishop of Capua to the imperial camp, to prevent the country being ravaged. The archbishop was obliged at the through Florence, where he found the citizens far otherwise disposed than his holiness had imagined, which made him haften the interview which he proposed to have with the emperor at Bologna, concerning the affairs of Italy, but chiefly those of Florence.

M in 2

Siege of

IT was the 20th of October before the prince of Orange, Florence. who still pretended to wait for the Siennese artillery, reached the plain of Ripoli, two miles from Florence, with all his troops and cannon. As the situation of that city is very unequal, lying in the midst of hills interspersed with vallies, and divided by the river Arno, the siege of it proved a matter of more difficulty than the prince had foreseen. On the 24th he took possession of the hills near the fortifications, all along from the gate of San Miniato to that of San Giorgio, on the one fide, and, on the other, from the same gate to the road from the gate of San Nicolo. The Florentines had in their city eight thousand troops, on whom they might depend; and they had placed sufficient garrisons in Prato, Pistoia, Empoli, Pisa, and Liverne; and intrusted the defence of the places of less importance to their own inhabitants, and the strength of their The Siennese thought that this was a proper time for recovering Monte Pulciano from the Florentines; but it was luckily faved by some Florentine soot who were in the place, and who were afterwards supported by three hundred horse under Napoleone Orsino, a Florentine officer. The country of Tuscany, at this time, was terribly ravaged by troops of banditti and irregulars, the Siennese particularly, who plundered equally friends and foes.

Charles against them.

IT was now plain to his holiness, that the siege of Florence prepossessed would prove a matter of the utmost distinculty. He was then arrived at Bologna, to which place Charles repaired foon after; and at their interview, and in their conversation, they treated each other with the greatest marks of friendship, esteem, and affection. Charles, receiving undoubted intelligence that the Turks had been repulsed before Vienna, and had retreated towards Hungary, resolved now to proceed more earnessly than ever in settling the affairs of Italy. He had been prevailed upon by the pope to admit the new Florentine deputies to an audience; and the answer he gave them was dictated by his holiness, who more than ever insisted upon the reduction of Florence. Charles, who had been impressed with a notion that the Florentines always inclined to the French interest, had no objection to that; but complained of the want of money, and faid, that it was necessary to come to an accommodation with the Venetians and the duke of Milan, who otherwise might affish the Florentines. The pope, on the other hand, offered to pay to the army of the prince of Orange, who had left the fiege, and was come to Bologna to affist at the conferences, fixty thousand ducats every month, provided his imperial majesty, after coming to an agreement with the Venetians and the duke of Milan, would employ all his troops in Lombardy in the fiege of Florence. The affair of the restitution of Modena and Reggio, to the duke of Ferrara, came next to be considered. Charles had promised to that duke, that they should be restored to him; but the pope remained inflexible against the restitution, because of their importance to Parma and Piacenza.

WHILE the conferences were thus depending at Bologna, Progress of accounts came of the vast progress the Lutherans were making the reforin Germany, where every thing was in confusion, and which mation. the Turks again threatened to invade. This news determined Charles to come to some agreement with the duke of Milan and the Venetians. Before his arrival in Italy, he had been so exasperated at that duke, that it was thought he would have cut off his head, had it been in his power; but reflecting now on the vast sums he had to no purpose lavished in Italy, his only study was how to bring about an accommodation with him, without derogating from the imperial authority. Had he listened to Anthony de Leva, he would have transferred the Milanese to the house of Medici; but the pope was averse to that proposal, because of the danger and difficulty with which it must be attended, and became a strong advocate for Sforza. who continued to be strengously supported by the Venetians. Charles, therefore, resolving to cut short all difficulties, sent Sforza a safe-conduct, that he might come and justify his conduct before him at Bologna. Sforza accepted of the fafe-conduct, and arrived at Bologna, where appearing be-Sforza fore the emperor, he thanked him for being admitted to his submits to presence; but added, that he required no other safe-conduct Charles. than his own innocence and his majesty's justice, and laid the paper that contained it before Charles, who was highly pleased with the duke's magnanimity. It was now the end of November; and though the pope was indefatigable in his endeavours to bring about a peace between Charles and the Venetians, as well as Sforza, the negociations took up almost a month. At last, on the 23d of December, both accommodations were concluded.

By that with Sforza, the latter was to pay to Charles, A peace within one year, one hundred thousand ducats, and fifty thou-concluded. Sand ducats annually for ten years after; in consideration of which, Charles agreed to confirm to Sforza the investiture of the Milanese; but he was to keep in his hands Como, and the M m 2 castle through Florence, where he found the citizens far otherwife disposed than his holiness had imagined, which made him hasten the interview which he proposed to have with the emperor at Bologna, concerning the affairs of Italy, but chiefly those of Florence.

Siege of

IT was the 20th of October before the prince of Orange. Florence. who still pretended to wait for the Siennese artillery, reached the plain of Ripoli, two miles from Florence, with all his troops and cannon. As the situation of that city is very unequal, lying in the midst of hills interspersed with vallies, and divided by the river Arno, the fiege of it proved a matter of more difficulty than the prince had foreseen. On the 24th he took possession of the hills near the fortifications, all along from the gate of San Miniato to that of San Giorgio, on the one fide, and, on the other, from the same gate to the road from the gate of San Nicolo. The Florentines had in their city eight thousand troops, on whom they might depend; and they had placed sufficient garrisons in Prato, Pistoia, Empoli, Pisa, and Liverne; and intrusted the desence of the places of less importance to their own inhabitants, and the strength of their The Siennese thought that this was a proper time lituation. for recovering Monte Pulciano from the Florentines; but it was luckily faved by some Florentine soot who were in the place, and who were afterwards supported by three hundred horse under Napoleone Or sino, a Florentine officer. The country of Tuscany, at this time, was terribly ravaged by troops of banditti and irregulars, the Siennese particularly, who plundered equally friends and foes.

Charles against them.

IT was now plain to his holiness, that the siege of Florence prepossessed would prove a matter of the utmost difficulty. He was then arrived at Bologna, to which place Charles repaired foon after; and at their interview, and in their conversation, they treated each other with the greatest marks of friendship, esteem, and affection. Charles, receiving undoubted intelligence that the Turks had been repulsed before Vienna, and had retreated towards Hungary, resolved now to proceed more earnessly than ever in settling the affairs of Italy. He had been prevailed upon by the pope to admit the new Florentine deputies to an audience; and the answer he gave them was dictated by his holiness, who more than ever insisted upon the reduction of Florence. Charles, who had been impressed with a notion that the Florentines always inclined to the French interest, had no objection to that; but complained of the want of money, and faid, that it was necessary to come to an accommodation with the Venetians and the duke of Milan, who otherwise might affist the Florentines. The pope, on the other hand, hand, offered to pay to the army of the prince of Orange, who had left the fiege, and was come to Bologna to affish at the conferences, fixty thousand ducats every month, provided his imperial majesty, after coming to an agreement with the Venetians and the duke of Milan, would employ all his troops in Lombardy in the fiege of Florence. The affair of the restitution of Modena and Reggio, to the duke of Ferrara, came next to be considered. Charles had promised to that duke, that they should be restored to him; but the pope remained inflexible against the restitution, because of their importance to Parma and Piacenza.

WHILE the conferences were thus depending at Bologna, Progress of accounts came of the vast progress the Lutherans were making the reforin Germany, where every thing was in confusion, and which mation. the Turks again threatened to invade. This news determined Charles to come to some agreement with the duke of Milan and the Venetians. Before his arrival in Italy, he had been so exasperated at that duke, that it was thought he would have cut off his head, had it been in his power; but reflecting now on the vast fums he had to no purpose lavished in Italy, his only study was how to bring about an accommodation with him, without derogating from the imperial authority. Had he listened to Anthony de Leva, he would have transferred the Milanese to the house of Medici; but the pope was averse to that proposal, because of the danger and difficulty with which it must be attended, and became a strong advocate for Sforza. who continued to be strenuously supported by the Venetians. Charles, therefore, refolving to cut short all difficulties, sent Sforza a safe-conduct, that he might come and justify his conduct before him at Bologna. Sforza accepted of the safe-conduct, and arrived at Bologna, where appearing be-Sforza fore the emperor, he thanked him for being admitted to his fubmits to presence; but added, that he required no other safe-conduct Charles. than his own innocence and his majesty's justice, and laid the paper that contained it before Charles, who was highly pleased with the duke's magnanimity. It was now the end of November; and though the pope was indefatigable in his endeavours to bring about a peace between Charles and the Venetians, as well as Sforza, the negociations took up almost a month. At last, on the 23d of December, both accommodations were concluded.

By that with Sforza, the latter was to pay to Charles, A peace within one year, one hundred thousand ducats, and fifty thou-concluded. fand ducats annually for ten years after; in consideration of which, Charles agreed to confirm to Sforza the investiture of the Milanese; but he was to keep in his hands Como, and the M m 2 castle castle of Milan, till the first payment was made. By the treaty with the Venetians, the latter promised to restore Ravenna and Cervia, with all their dependencies, to the pope; to restore to the emperor all that they possessed in the kingdom of Naples; and to pay him, by way of arrears, fifty thousand ducats, upon his restoring to them their places in his possession; and they were afterwards to pay one hundred thousand ducats more. These are the only heads of this accommodation that sall within our design.

The fiege of Florence continued,

ALL the wars of Italy were now contracted to the fiege of Florence, which continued to make so gallant a defence, that the prince of Orange was obliged to bring a body of pioneers, and some field pieces, from Lucca. He then erected a battery against the bastion of San Miniato, which he endeavoured to ftorm, but with very little success; so that all he could do was to take possession of the towns of Colle and San Geminiano, for securing his convoys from Sienna, from whence he drew his provisions. All his affaults continuing ineffectual, the operations of the fiege were flackened, and the prince, drawing off his troops, turned it into a kind of blockade; during which the belieged made feveral fallies with confiderable fuc-In this languishing state of the siege, Charles, having completed his accommodation, fent from Lombardy four thou-Sand German, and two thousand five hundred Spanish soot. eight hundred Italians, and above three hundred light horse, with twenty-five pieces of artillery, to affift at the fiege of Florence; but the valour of the besieged, and the strength of the city, was such, that the besiegers durst not venture upon an affault: while the Florentines, now thinking they were no match for their enemies in the open field, discontinued their fallies; so that, for some time, a total inactivity ensued between the two parties. The prince, however, found means to fend fifteen hundred foot, four hundred horse, and four pieces of cannon, against Lastra, which, according to Paul Youius, made a noble defence; but not being relieved in time. it was taken, and about two hundred of the garrifon put to This loss was recompensed to the Florentines by the fword. I successful sally, which Stefano Colonna, at the head of sixteen thousand Florentines, all disguised like Spaniards, made upon a quarter of the befiegers, where he put a vast number to the fword, and returned to Florence, without losing a man. It was about this time that Pirro di Piero, in marching to attack Montepoli, a town in the Pisan territory, was intercepted by the Florentine garrison of Empoli which defeated him, and made many of his men prisoners. Napoleone Crimo ike wife checked Aleffandro Vitelli, who committed great ravages in the territory of Borgo San Sepolcro. On the other hand, the Florentine garrifons of Pificia and Prato, intimidated by the reinforcement that had arrived from Lomba dy to the beliegers, abandoned those places, which immediately submitted to the pontiff; as did Pietra Santa.

In the beginning of the year 1530, the besiegers had been to the disfo far from making any progress against Florence, that the pope advantage was persuaded, by Malatesta Baglioni, to send the bishop of of the Im-Faenza to Florence to treat with them of an accommodation. Perialifts. The Florentines, who were far from being averse to peace, fuffered this negociation to go on. But the whole appeared afterwards to be an artifice of Malatesta, whose time in the Florentine service was now almost expired; for the Florentines. for fear of his going over to the pope, who had offered him great terms, renewed their contract with him, and appointed him to be their captain-general. The bishop of Facuza's negociation, however, with Malatesta, encouraged the Florentines to make fresh applications, by their ambassadors, to the emperor and the pope; but without, in the least, departing from the demands they had made for securing their liberties, and this rendered the whole negociation fruitless; for Charles refused to admit them to his presence, and they returned to Florence.

THE marquis del Guasto commanded the imperial troops, It is reinthat had come from Lombardy to affish at the siege of Florence; forced,
and he encamped at Peretola, without venturing to advance farther, leaving the operations of the siege to the prince of Orange, who thought his character was now at stake, and resolved to proceed with the utmost vigour. In January, he erected new works, ordered his troops to take post nearer the city, and made dispositions for battering the bastion of San Giorgio, the strongest about Florence, and defended by Stefano Colonna. But after all the vast preparations the prince made, finding the attempt impracticable, he desisted from it;
and thus a blockade, rather than a siege, was still continued.

THE Florentines were now in high spirits: by the access Resolution shows of strength the garrison had received, it amounted to of the Floabout ten thousand men; but they received the pay of sour-rentine ofteen thousand. This confirmed the soldiers in their duty, sicers, and they resulted no toils or danger in discharging it. Their officers, to encourage them to perseverance in those sentiments, held an assembly in the church of San Nicolo, where, after mass had been performed, they took a solemn oath, in the presence of Malatesta, their captain-general, to defend the city to the last extremity. They were not, however, unaminous nimous in this resolution; for Napoleone Or sino, after receiving advance-money from the Florentines, left their service, and at Bracciano entered into that of the pope and the emperor, to whom he promised that all the subalterns in his pay should follow him.

THE unexpected defence made by the Florentines was so

The pope applies to Francis.

alarming to the pope, that he at last had recourse to the French king. Francis, who had his reasons at that time for managing his holiness, at his earnest folicitation fent Chrmont, one of his ministers, to Florence, where, after making the best apology he could for the necessity his master was under to abandon them at the treaty of Cambray, offered his mediation between them and his holiness; but at the same time gave them to understand in public, that Francis expected they would, in any event, submit to the pontist and the emperor, and that all they were to expect from his negotiation, was to get the best terms that possibly could be obtained. But Francis was infincere in the whole transaction; for though Clermont, His policy. in his master's name, required both Malatesta and Stefano Cilonna, who received French pay, to leave Florence, he fectely advised them to the contrary; and though Francis had carried his diffimulation so far as to recal Vigny, his resident at Florence, from thence, yet he still maintained an agent there, and gave the heads of the Florentines private affurances that he would fend them effectual affistance as soon as he could recover his children out of the emperor's hands. used likewise his utmost endeavours to prevail with Francis to discharge the Florentine ambassador from his court, and presented his chancellor and favourite with a cardinal's hat and the legateship of France, by the hands of the bishop of That prelate was, at the same time, empowered by his holiness to propose an interview between himself, the French king, and the emperor, at Turin. To this proposal he was answered, that such a meeting could, with no propriety, take place, while the young princes of France continued in prison; nor did his majesty think it safe for him

The empelogna.

His holiness having miscarried in this scheme, he persuaded ror crown- the emperor to repair with him to Sienna, that they might be ed at Bo- nearer at hand for giving orders about the siege of Florence; but the emperor shewing some impatience at not having received the imperial crown in Italy, it was proposed that that ceremony should be performed at Rome. When he and the pope were on the point of fetting out for that city, advices came that the disorders in Germany were encreased, and that the presence of Charks in the empire was now absolutely necellary to run himself into the like danger.

ceffary for suppressing them, by calling a diet of the empire, a general council of the church, and for electing his brother the archduke Ferdinand, king of the Romans. Upon this the emperor and his holiness repaired to Bologna, where Charles was crowned. This ceremony being over, the duke of Ferrara's affairs came next under confideration. The emperor had a much greater personal regard for that duke than he had for the pontiff, and had eluded all the pope's arts to bring him to a declaration in his favour concerning Modena and Reggio. On the seventh of March the duke came, under a safeconduct that had been granted him, to Bologna, and the pope and he entered together into a compromise to refer all matters in difference between them to the emperor's arbitration. Charles affected great partiality for the pope, to whom he promised to adjudge Modena and Reggio, if upon examination they should be found to belong to the holy see; and if they should not, he promised to let the time prefixed for the arbitration elapse, without pronouncing any sentence at all. the some time Charles, still farther to please his holiness. obliged the duke of Ferrara to recal his ambassador from Florence, and to furnish a body of pioneers to affish in the fiege of that city. It was the twenty-second of March before the emperor left Bologna, and the thirty-first of the same month before the pontiff fet out for Rome.

THE prospect of taking Florence was still at a great distance; progress and though the prince of Orange had several times ordered of the the bastion of San Giorgio to be stormed, his troops were re-fiege of pulsed in all their assaults. The prince did not succeed bet-florence ter in his attempts to batter the same bastion, for his artillery was too weak to make any considerable impression upon it; and his army must have been greatly reduced in numbers, had it not received daily supplies of disbanded soldiers, invited thither by the plunder of the Florentine territories, and unable to find employment in any other part of Italy.

FRANCESCO FERUCCIO was then the Florentine commandant in the important town of Empoli. He had, by his boldness, activity, and fortune, risen to that station from a low command; and having been extremely fortunate in his excursions, he had got together a choice body of troops. The pope had got possession of the city of Volterra, as dependent upon Florence; but the castle holding out, the imperial army battered it with five pieces of artillery which they had brought from Genoa. The Florentines had the preservation of this fortress greatly at heart, and ordered one hundred and fifty horse, and five companies of foot, to advance to Empoli, and to put themselves under the command of Feruccio, who was to attempt the relief of the castle of Volterra. tachment fet out by night for Empeli, the foot taking one way, and the horse another; and the foot having deseated a party of imperialists who attacked them, both they and the horse arrived safe at Empoli. Feruccio lost no time in marching to the relief of the castle of Volterra, which he entered on the twenty-fixth of April with two thousand foot and one hundred and fifty horse. He instantly attacked and carried the intrenchments that had been raised by the imperialists, and the very next morning the city, and all the artillery employed in the fiege, fell into his hands. This fortunate expedition was followed by other vigorous measures, which Feruccio undertook. His army daily encreasing, he laid a scheme for surprising Colle and San Geminiano, and thereby cutting off all communication between Sienna and the imperial army before Florence, which must thereby have been vastly distressed; and which now despairing of taking Florence by storm, had again turned the fiege into a blockade. But Maramaus, an imperial general, arriving with two thousand five hundred foot, all of them volunteers, in the neighbourhood of Volterra, defeated Feruccio's schemes.

of Feruc. cio,

His imprudence occasioned a still greater blow to Florence. When he marched to the relief of Volterra, he left too flight a garrison in Empoli. This encouraged the marquis del Guasto to attack the place, which he took by florm, and put the garrison to the sword. This loss was the more sensibly selt by the Florentines, who greatly depended upon the conveniency of its fituation for diffressing the imperialists, and obliging them to raise the blockade. On the other hand, the marquis del Guasto, after taking Empoli, joined Maramaus, who remained in the neighbourhood, or rather the suburbs, of Volterra; and his army then confisting of about fix thousand men, he battered the city; and having made a breach, he attempted to florm it, but was beat off with the loss of four , hundred men. He erected a new battery, and made a fresh assault; but being repulsed with a still greater loss, he raised the flege.

the Floreatines.

Diffress of By this time the blockade of Florence had, by degrees, reduced that city to great want of provisions. On the ninth of May they attacked the imperialists, by a fally from the Roman gate; but with very little fuccess, having lost one hundred and thirty men, and the beliegers about two hundred. They had now placed their chief dependence upon being fuccoured by the French king, who had actually remitted to them, though in partial ineffectual payments, twenty thousand ducats. But they were soon satisfied that they had nothing to expect expect from Francis. The time of the performance of all his mighty promises was now arrived. He had, in the beginning of June, recovered his children, by paying the money stipulated for their deliverance. But some fresh causes of discontent, on both hands, arising between the pope and the emperor, the former began now to make advances to Francis, who was by no means averse to an accommodation; so that instead of sending the Florentines assistance, as he had promised, in men and money, he sent Pierfrancesco da Pontremoli to negotiate an agreement between them and the pontiff. The arrival of this minister at Florence threw a dreadful damp upon the Florentines, who now faw they were to be facrificed to the extreme defire which Francis had to keep the pope on his fide, by fuffering the flege to go forward. Notwithstanding Their this galling disappointment, and all the miseries they suffered, loffes. the Florentines still kept up their spirits; and on the very day that the marquis del Guasto took Empoli, Malatesta and Stefano Colonna made a fally with three thousand men, in two divifions, to attack the imperialists, who were quartered in the fortified monastery of San Donato. Stefano entered the trenches, and did confiderable execution upon the enemy; but not being supported by Malatesta, whom he therefore accused of cowardice and treachery, he was obliged to retreat to the city.

THE distress of the Florentines for provisions still encreasing, They lose and all their hopes of foreign affiftance being now at an end, all bopes they had no resource but in Feruccio. They sent him orders of relief. to march from Volterra to Pifa, and after affembling all the by the deforces there he could to march to Florence, being determined feat of upon his arrival to throw open their gates, and to come to a Feruccio. decifive action with the befiegers. Necessity alone justified this expedient, as Feruccio must fight his way through his enemies, every step he advanced. It was suspected, with some appearance of reason, that Malatesta apprized the prince of Orange, with whom he kept up a correspondence, of this defign; and that he had given him affurances he would not attack the imperialists in his absence. Be that as it will, the prince, against all the rules of war, drew off the best part of his troops from the fiege, and advanced to fight Feruccio, who, in his march from Pifa, proceeded by the way of Lucca, in hopes of being joined by some of the Lucquese. The two armies met together near Cavinana: that of the imperialists was superior in every respect; and a bloody engagement enfued, in which the prince of Orange, distinguishing himself rather as a private subaltern than a general, was killed. The imperialitis, however, were victorious; and Feruccio, who was taken prisoner, was put to death in cold blood by Maramaus, in refentment, as was supposed, of his hanging a trumpeter, who, during the fiege of Volterra, had been fent into that city with a mellage.

courage.

THOUGH Guicciardin, in his relation of all the passages during this fiege, is evidently partial to the interests of the pope, whom he served; yet it appears upon the face of the very facts he relates, that the Florentine magistrates continued to defend themselves with assonishing intrepidity, still trusting. to the care of Providence, or to some accident that might happen in their favour. Though pressed to surrender by Gonzaga, who succeeded the prince of Orange in his command, they rejected all terms of accommodation; and some amongst them were enthusialts enough to believe that God would work a miracle for their deliverance. A great part of the citizens, however, were in their hearts disposed to listen to an accommodation; but were over-awed from discovering their senti-The magistrates, with the gonfalonier at their head, now came to the desperate resolution of attacking their enemies in their entrenchments, and gave orders for that purpose to their general Malatesta. He at first remonstrated upon the madness of the attempt, and the wickedness of bringing inevitable ruin on so noble a city; but at last, finding all his representations in vain, and influenced with the hopes of being restored by the pope to the government of Perugia, he flatly refused to obey the orders given him, and put his troops under arms. Upon this the magistrates formally divested him of his command; and some of the most resolute of the citizens went to intimate to him his dismission, and an order to withdraw out of the city with his own troops. Malatesta into such a sury, that he drew his dagger, and would have killed one of the messengers, had he not been faved by some of his attendants. Malatesta's obstinacy, however, on this occasion faved the city and its inhabitants from destruction, by encouraging all the Medicean, and the moderate party, to join him; so that all Florence was instantly in an uproar. This did not deter the gonfalonier, and those of his party, who put themselves in arms, and threatened some times to attack Malatesta, and some times the imperialists.

They are compelled by Malatesta and misery to capitultae.

A. D. 1531.

AT last, however, the party for an accommodation growing every hour more numerous, the gonfalonier was obliged to submit, and to send out a deputation to Gonzaga, with the terms on which they were willing to conclude a convention. The terms. These were, that the Florentines should, in a few days, pay to the army eighty thousand ducats, on condition of its raising the fiege; that the pope should agree to submit to the arbitration of Charles the form of government under which the Florentines were to live, with a salvo, however, to the enjoyment of their liberties, and that he should pronounce sentence on that head within three months; that all injuries done to the pope, his family, friends, and servants, should be forgiven; and that Malatesta should remain with a guard of two thousand infantry in the city, till the declaration of Charles should arrive.

tration

WHEN we consider the state of Florence, at the time when Not abthis capitulation was made, it cannot be faid to have been ferved by very disadvantageous to the Florentines, it being, in fact, the the pope; same that they had so frequently offered before; but had been rejected on account of the falvo to public liberty. But the pope was glad of a capitulation at any rate, because he knew well how to break it if his party was once admitted into Flo-The Florentine state had now exhausted all its wealth: and great difficulties were found in raising money, both for the imperialists and for paying off their own troops. His holines took advantage of this; and his apostolical commissary. Bartolemeo Valori, confederated with Malatesta, who was now become the creature of the pope, from the extreme defire he had to return to Perugia; and, by their own authority. they convoked, according to ancient custom, an assembly of the people in parliament, none of the magistracy daring to oppose him; and in this parliament the popular constitution of Florence was abolished. Twelve citizens, partizans of the Medici family, were chosen to new model the constitution, which they restored to the form it had before the last revolution, when the Medici interest was expelled. This being done, their army was paid off; but their officers defrauded the foldiers of the greatest part of the money, which they carried back with them to Florence, leaving the others difbanded and dispersed. As to the imperial troops, after they were paid off, they evacuated Florence, and all its territory, and marched to Sienna, there to new model the government, according to the will of their master. Malatesta Baglioni obtaining the pope's leave for his return to Perugia, immediately fet off for that city; and, without any regard to the capitulation; lest Florence to the mercy of the pope.

His holiness had so far a regard for public decency, that who alls he did not chuse, without some slight shew at least of reason, cruelly and to break through that article of the capitulation, which stipu-desposically lated a pardon for all his and his family's enemies. His creatures in Florence who held the government, pretended that no pardon had been promised to those who had been guilty of malversations in the state; and under that insamous distinction

gces to Marfeil-Orleans.

interview was full of mutual expressions of friendship; and the king won the heart of his holiness by entreating him to les, where send for his niece to Marseilles, where, as soon as the arbis niece is rived, the marriage was celebrated and confummated. The married 10 festivity of the occasion did not admit of much public business the duke of being transacted. It seems probable, however, that a private convention was entered into by the king and his holiness, for transferring to the duke of Orleans the duchy of Milan, as being the most effectual way not only to gratify the pope's private ambition, but to prevent any disputes amongst the children of Francis after-his death. Francis had this acquisition so much at heart, that he performed his promise of not teazing the pope with any troublesome requests, excepting that of his creating three new cardinals, which his holiness, though with great reluctance, did; and, according to Guicciardin, the duke of Albany's brother was one of them. As to the affairs of England, Francis gave up all concern with them; and one day happening to come into the pope's bed-chamber, where he found some of Henry's agents behaving irreverently towards the pontiff, and threatening him with an appeal to a general council, he told his holiness that he had no objection to his proceeding against the English with the utmost rigour of ecclesiastical censures. After this, the greatest harmony, in every respect, reigned between the king and the pontiff, even to the incredible resolution they took of spiriting up the Protestants of Germany against Charles, in which they both concurred. Upon Clement's return to Rome, he took a severe revenge upon his enemies, and those of the house of Medici; and died soon after he had made his nephew Alexander master of Florence. WE now take leave of Florence as a republic; and the states and kingdoms of Europe that have been given in the course of this work. Alexander de Medici, after marrying Margaret, the natural daughter of Charles V. was by him made sovereign master of Florence in 1531; and though he pretended to govern by the advice of a council of citizens, yet he was guilty of the most tyrannical proceedings. The Florentines, however, had not forgotten that they had once been free; and Lorenzo, or Laurensin de Medici, who was defeended from a younger brother of Colmo the father of his country, laid a plot to definey him. He was affifted in this by the abhorience in which the Florentine nobility in general held Alexander, who had invaded the beds of the most consider-and amongst them. Lorenzo knowing his cousin's weakness in that respect, pretended that he would introduce into his tation he had expressed for him before, and to be less care-Coldness beful of pleasing him. The prodigious abuses of the papal tween the power in Germany endangered the allegiance of that empire pope and to Charles; and even the Roman Catholic princes and states Charles, there loudly called for a general council, as being the only remedy for the public distractions. The emperor was of the fame opinion, and earnestly applied to the pope to convoke This could be no agreeable proposal to his holiness, who was conscious of his having been guilty of subordination. fimony, perjury, treachery, usurpation, and every species of wickedness. He sent Charles many reasons why it was not proper at that time to convoke a general council; but gave him leave to promise, in his name, to the diet, that he would call one, provided it might be held in Italy, himself presiding at it; and that the Lutherans and the other sectaries should, in the mean time, return to the obedience of the church, and bind themselves to submit to the decisions of the council. Charles was fensible that those inadmissible conditions amounted to a refusal on the part of the pope of what he required; and his refentment manifested itself in an affair that nearly concerned his holiness.

Hiftory of the Medici remaining part of its history is blended with that of the other jumic.

Alexander,

THE time was now come for Charles to pronounce sentence who debetween the pope and the duke of Ferrara. The differences cides the between them had been canvassed by the ablest lawyers in affair of Italy; and Charles, on the strength of their opinion, had de-Modena creed that Modena and Reggio b rightfully and lawfully belonged against to that duke; and that, upon his paying to his holiness one bim. hundred thousand crowns, he should be confirmed in the investiture of Ferrara, and the tribute required of him reduced to its old rate. This fentence was extremely mortifying to the pope, who complained that Charles had broken his promise of not pronouncing against him in any event. Charles, on the other hand, laid all the blame upon the pope's nuncio, the bishop of Vasione, who, presuming on the justice of his master's cause, had incessantly and arrogantly solicited Charles to pronounce fentence, and infolently pretended that he declined it, only to avoid doing justice to his holiness. The pope was far from being fatisfied with this apology, and refused either to ratify the sentence, or to accept of the money, which was tendered to him by the duke. This did not prevent Charles from refigning Modena, which he had long held as a deposit, to the duke, whom his holiness wanted, by all means, to oppress.

b Guicciand, book xx.

Francis intrigues againji Charles.

ALESSANDRO DE MEDICI was now invested with all his family power in Florence, which he held under an oath of allegiance to the emperor, whose natural daughter he was to marry. The implacable restless pontiff had secretly determined to alter the system of his political conduct. The French king, from motives foreign to this history, continued to be the inveterate enemy of Charles; but not being in a condition to enter into an open war with him, he had recourse to intrigues in Germany, where he gave the Protestants, and the enemies of the house of Austria, hopes that he would declare himself their protector, though at the same time he was publicly burning heretics in his own capital; but his great icheme was to detach the pope from the emperor. A feciet correspondence for that purpose had been carried on between Francis and his holiness; and the former had even proposed a marriage between his second fon and Clement's niece Cuberine, the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici. His holines was not proof against so dazzling an alliance, and, provided Francis was fincere in the proposal, he resolved to embrace it whatever it cost him. In the mean while he refolved to keep fair with Charles, to whom he advanced forty thouland crowns, towards the expences of his war with the Turks; and he sent another of his nephews, the cardinal de Attairs of Melici, to attend him in Germany as apostolical legate. The Germany, troubles of the empire daily encreasing, and the infidels again threatening to invade it with a powerful army, Charles ordered the margnis del Guaffo to march to Germany, with all the Spanish troops, and as many Florentine and other Italian horse and foot as he could take into his pay. All the apprehensions of invasion from the Turks soon vanishing, Charles, who was excelled bent upon returning to Spain, having compromised matters, in the best manner he could, with the Protestants, ordered the Florentines, and other Italians in his fervice, to march to Hungary. This they absolutely refused to do; and a downright mutiny enfued, though Charles had in person en leavoured to appeale them. They all of them broke up their camp, and, to a man, returned towards Italy, deliroving the houses and lands of the imperial subjects all the way they passed, in revenge, as they said, of the ravages the imperialists had committed in Italy.

A. D. 15;2.

Car.linal err fel.

THE young cardinal de Medici was suspected to have been de Medici the fecret infligator of this mutiny, and for that purpose had employed Piermaria Roffs, an Italian general. This suspicion was confirmed by the cardinal and Piermaria leaving Charles, who was now on his return to Spain by the way of Italy, and . potting after the mutineers. Charles reflected, that the cardihal might be offended at the preference he had given to his cousin Alessandro in the government of Florence, and that it was possible he would put himself at the head of the mutineers, and attempt a revolution in that state. He therefore ordered both him and Piermaria to be arrested. It soon appeared, that the cardinal had acted from no motive but that of youthful levity; and he was immediately released by the emperor, who made an apology both to him and the pope for what had happened, and soon after released Piermaria likewise.

UPON the arrival of Charles in Italy, he had intelligence Interview that the kings of France and England had been hindered only between by the retreat of the Turks out of Germany, from attacking Charles the duchy of Milan. He likewise had an intimation of the and the fecret negociation carrying on between the pope and the pope. French king. He therefore invited the pope to another perfonal interview at Bologna, to which his holiness readily agreed, that he might give Charles no pretext for remaining any confiderable time in Italy. This new interview took place about the end of the year, and, like the former, it passed with all the exterior demonstrations of affection and friendship on both sides: but their interior sentiments were very different. Charles again infifted upon the pope convoking a general council, and upon a public league being formed amongst all the potentates and states of Italy, by which, each was to contribute a proportionable quota for the defence of the Milanese, in case it should be again attacked by Francis. He likewise proposed a marriage between the pope's niece Catherine and the duke of Milan, the better to break off the connexions between his holiness and the French king.

THE pope formed strong objections to all those proposals. A congress He was against the league, because he had certain intelli- of the Itagence that the French king, if farther exasperated, would sian flates. join with the king of England. He repeated the objections he had urged before against the council, and he declined the marriage between Sforza and his niece, for fear of exasperating Francis. After various conferences between his holiness and the emperor, they agreed to refer the matter of the confederacy to be fettled by commissioners appointed on both sides. Those on the part of Charles were Covos, the grand commendatory of Leon; Granvelle, afterwards the celebrated cardinal of that name; and Prata: on the part of the pope appeared cardinal de Medici, Jacopo Salviati, Guicciardin. The instructions of the latter were to proceed with great caution; fo as to conceal the true motives why the pope was averfe to the league. They accordingly offered to renew the former confederacy, provided the Venetians, who by it were obliged Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI. Nα

gces to Marseil-Orleans.

interview was full of mutual expressions of friendship; and the king won the heart of his holiness by entreating him to les, where send for his niece to Marseilles, where, as soon as she arbis niece is rived, the marriage was celebrated and confummated. The married to festivity of the occasion did not admit of much public business the duke of being transacted. It seems probable, however, that a private convention was entered into by the king and his holiness, for transferring to the duke of Orleans the duchy of Milan, as being the most effectual way not only to gratify the pope's private ambition, but to prevent any disputes amongst the children of Francis after-his death. Francis had this acquisition so much at heart, that he performed his promise of not teazing the pope with any troublesome requests, excepting that of his creating three new cardinals, which his holiness, though with great reluctance, did; and, according to Guicciardin, the duke of Albany's brother was one of them. As to the affairs of England, Francis gave up all concern with them; and one day happening to come into the pope's bed-chamber, where he found some of Henry's agents behaving irreverently towards the pontiff, and threatening him with an appeal to a general council, he told his holiness that he had no objection to his proceeding against the English with the utmost rigour of ecclesiastical censures. After this, the greatest harmony, in every respect, reigned between the king and the pontiff, even to the incredible resolution they took of spiriting up the Protestants of Germany against Charles, in which they both concurred. Upon Clement's return to Rome, he took a fevere revenge upon his enemies, and those of the house of Medici; and died soon after he had made his nephew Alexander master of Florence. WE now take leave of Florence as a republic; and the

Hiftory of jumic.

Alexander.

the Medici remaining part of its history is blended with that of the other states and kingdoms of Europe that have been given in the course of this work. Alexander de Medici, after marrying Margaret, the natural daughter of Charles V. was by him made sovereign master of Florence in 1531; and though he pretended to govern by the advice of a council of citizens, yet he was guilty of the most tyrannical proceedings. The Florentines, however, had not forgotten that they had once been free; and Lorenzo, or Laurensin de Medici, who was de-. , seended from a younger brother of Cosmo the father of his country, laid a plot to defirey him. He was affifted in this by the abhorience in which the Florentine nobility in general held Alexander, who had invaded the beds of the most considerable amongst them. Lorenzo knowing his cousin's weakness in that respect, pretended that he would introduce imo his

the pope consented to a suspension of all hostilities for eigh- which end teen months. This matter being compromised, the terms of in a confethe confederacy were figured on the twenty-fourth of Fe- deracy.

bruary.

THIS confederacy obliged the emperor, and all the potentates and states of Naples, the Venetians excepted, to defend Italy, and to furnish each a certain number of troops for that end. The emperor was to contribute in money every month thirty thousand ducats. The pope, for himself and the Florentines, twenty thousand; the duke of Milan ten thoufand; the duke of Ferrara twelve thousand; the Genoese six thousand; the Siennese two thousand; and the Lucquese one thousand. A certain sum was to be immediately deposited in case of a sudden attack; but it was not to be broken into, unless the danger was threatning. It was agreed to pay a small annuity to the generals who were in the service of the league. even in time of peace, provided they did not leave Italy; and that the Swifs should receive certain gratuities to keep them from joining the French. Antony de Leva was unanimously appointed captain-general of all the troops of the confederacy, and it was agreed that he should reside at Milan.

IT is observable, that the pope would not agree to the Florentines being named as contracting parties in this league. otherwise than as they had been in the former; nor could

Charles object to the omission.

...

This great point being settled, the affair of the general Differences council next came under deliberation. But here Charles found continue his holiness more intractable than he had been with regard to between the league, to which his great objection of offending Francis the pape had been partly removed, by suppressing all mention of the Charles. Florentines as principals. Charles infisted upon an immediate indiction of the council, which the pope absolutely refused to comply with, unless it should be previously accepted by the kings of England and France, without whose consent it was impossible it could be attended with any good effect. He offered, however, to fend nuncios to all the Christian powers to dispose them to compliance; but Charles could not bring him to promise that he would summon the council, even if they should not concur; so that, though the nuncios set out, there was little hopes of their fucceeding.

WHILE those matters were under debate, the arrival of Negociatwo French cardinals at Bologna to treat of the marriage be- tion and tween the French king's son and Catherine de Medici, lest agreement Charles no room to doubt of the correspondence between him between and the pontiff. The truth is, the match in every respect the pope was so unequal, that neither Charles nor the pontiff believed and Franthat Francis in proposing it was in earnest; and the former cis.

Nn 2

had ever mentioned it in that light to Charles, who seemed to difregard it. Upon the atrival, however, of the cardinals, Charles reproached Clement with underhand dealing; but he put his majesty in mind that he had mentioned the affair to him before, and that he still continued of opinion that Francis meant only to amuse him; but that it would not be decent for him to be the first to break off a negociation which did fo much bonour to his family. Charles required he would put the French king's fincerity to the teff, by infiffing upon the cardinals immediately receiving full powers from France to settle the contract of marriage. This demand was complied with, and the cardinals in a very few days received their commissions with full powers.

An interposed.

CHARLES was now convinced that if the pope had wiew pro- not made concessions to his prejudice, Francis would never have agreed to fo extravagant a proposal; and he soon was certainly informed that an interview had been agreed upon between them at Nizza, a town belonging to Savey. Had not Charles been so intent as he was upon his journey to Spain, he would have perhaps found means to have made his holiness repent of his conduct. But he was in haste to set out for Spain, with intention, as was thought, to have broken off the match between his natural daughter and Alessandro de Medici, if that between Catherine and the French king's fon should take place. But his holiness, having now secured to his family the government of Florence, regarded the dictates of ambition, and rested secure in the protection of France against all the resentment of Charles. Some who wished his family well suggested, that by matching Catherine to the French prince, he gave the latter and his descendants a plausible handle for claiming Florence and its territory, in prejudice of the other branches of the house. But Clement, dazzled by the splendor of the match, was deaf to all remonstrances. Not being, however, willing entirely to break with Charles, he entered into a separate agreement with him, by which he promised to pronounce sentence against Henry and his wife Anne Bullen, and to enter into all reasonable measures against England, both parties engaging themselves not to conclude any new alliances without mutual consent. Charles found himself obliged to agree to those terms, only because they were the best he could obtain; and upon the faith of this convention, he gave orders for difbanding the army he had in Italy.

Accommodation of the pope svitb Charles.

> CHARLES having embarked at Genog for Spain, the pope made a merit with the French cardinals of the equitotwo cardinals had brought him a letter from the French king

recom-

recommending it to his holiness, by all means, to persuade Charles to difmiss his army; so that Francis had no reason for taking the convention amis. It appears in fact, that Francis looked upon the dismission of the imperial army as the most effectual fervice that could have been done him at that time. He pressed the pope to hasten their interview at Nizza, and promised neither to press him on the head of any fresh engagements, nor, as he had ineffectually done, upon the creation of new cardinals, nor to draw him into a war, nor even to folicit him to favour the king of England in the proceedings concerning his marriage.

IT is probable, that if the connexions between his holiness Affairs of and the French king had sooner taken place, the latter might England. have prevailed upon Henry to have kept some measures with He had even taken advantage of some remaining qualms that Henry was touched with on the head of renouncing his former religion, to get him to consent to send a civil message to the pope, who, in that case, promised to form the process anew, and to pronounce the sentence between him and Catherine to be invalid. But the courier charged with this commission arrived two days later than the time asfigned by the pope, who had, by that time, thundered out his excommunications against Henry. Notwithstanding this, his holiness being extremely loth to be deprived of so noble a province as England had always been to the holy see, entertained some secret hopes that Francis would find means to reconcile him and Henry; and this made him the more intent upon the interview. The place of it, however, was changed to Marseilles, at the request of the duke of Savoy, who was afraid of offending Charles, if the interview should This change of place was agreebe held in his dominions. able to both parties, as it did honour to Francis, and gave the pope an opportunity to boast of the prodigious pains he took, and labour he submitted to, in forming a league against the infidels, and in reducing Henry back to the pale of the church; for such were the pretexts he made use of for his voyage. His true motive, however, was discovered by his putting his niece Catherine on board the French gallies, which were commanded by the duke of Albany, who landed her at Nizza, and returned with the gallies to Pisa, where the pope embarked, on the fourth of October, for Marfeilles, with vifible demonstrations of his pleasure in undertaking the voyage, which was prosperous. Being landed at Marseilles, he entered that city in a triumphant manner, attended by a numerous cavalcade of cardinals. The French king, attended by his fon the duke of Orleans, the future bridegroom, and his court, entered that city in like manner soon after, and Nn3· Apos

The pope gres to Marfeil-Orleans.

took up his lodging in the same palace with the pope. The interview was full of mutual expressions of friendship; and the king won the heart of his holiness by entreating him to les, where send for his niece to Marseilles, where, as soon as the arbis nicce is rived, the marriage was celebrated and confummated. The married to festivity of the occasion did not admit of much public business the duke of being transacted. It seems probable, however, that a private convention was entered into by the king and his holiness, for transferring to the duke of Orleans the duchy of Milan, as being the most effectual way not only to gratify the pope's private ambition, but to prevent any disputes amongst the children of Francis after-his death. Francis had this acquisition so much at heart, that he performed his promise of not teazing the pope with any troublesome requests, excepting that of his creating three new cardinals, which his holiness, though with great reluctance, did; and, according to Guicciardin, the duke of Albany's brother was one of them. As to the affairs of England, Francis gave up all concern with them; and one day happening to come into the pope's bed-chamber, where he found some of Henry's agents behaving irreverently towards the pontiff, and threatening him with an appeal to a general council, he told his holiness that he had no objection to his proceeding against the English with the utmost rigour of ecclesiastical censures. After this, the greatest harmony, in every respect, reigned between the king and the pontiff, even to the incredible resolution they took of spiriting up the Protestants of Germany against Charles, in which they both concurred. Upon Clement's return to Rome, he took a severe revenge upon his enemies, and those of the house of Medici; and died soon after he had made his nephew Alexander master of Florence. WE now take leave of Florence as a republic; and the

Hiftory of jamie.

Alexander,

the Medici remaining part of its history is blended with that of the other states and kingdoms of Europe that have been given in the course of this work. Alexander de Medici, after marrying Margaret, the natural daughter of Charles V. was by him made sovereign master of Florence in 1531; and though he pretended to govern by the advice of a council of citizens, yet he was guilty of the most tyrannical proceedings. The Florentines, however, had not forgotten that they had once been free; and Lorenzo, or Laurensin de Medici, who was defeended from a younger brother of Colmo the father of his country, laid a plot to definey him. He was affifted in this by the abhorience in which the Florentine nobility in general held Alexander, who had invaded the beds of the most considerable amongst them. Lorenzo knowing his cousin's weakness in that respect, pretended that he would introduce into his apartment a beautiful lady; by which means getting admittance into Alexander's bed-chamber, he and his affociates put him to death.

ALEXANDER was succeeded by Cosmo, the son of and Cos-John de Medici, whom we have already mentioned to have mo, who served so bravely in the Spanish and French armies, and who is made was so universally beloved, that he had the epithet of the Po- great duke pular. Cosmo was at Trebia, one of his lordships, when he of Floheard of Alexander's death; and though he was then but se-rence. venteen years of age, he formed a scheme for succeeding him, but without discovering the least appearance of his intention. Leaving his youthful companions, he applied himself to Vitelli, whose father had been put to death at Florence by the enemies of the house of Medici, and who was at the head of a considerable body of troops. Vitelli readily promised him his affiftance; and Cosmo repaired to Florence, where he concerted measures with cardinal Cibo and his mother, who was of the house of Salviati. The Florentines, on the death of Alexander, were divided amongst themselves on the form of government they should establish, and seemed inclinable to reestablish their ancient liberty. Upon this, Cosmo, though he had been received with great civility in the senate, ordered Vitelli to enter Florence with his troops, and to furround the fenate-house, while the members were debating. This vigorous step reconciled all parties, and they submitted to Cosmo in the same manner as they had done to his predecessor. It was not long before a party was formed against him, at the head of which was cardinal Salviati, who had diffuaded him all he could from accepting of his new power. But Cosmo, having obtained the approbation of the emperor, and got poffession of his predecessor's money, forced all the discontented to Jeave Florence, and to retire to Bologna, where they raised some troops under the command of Peter Strozzi, the son of Philip. Cosmo was so well served by Vitelli, and his other officers, that Strozzi and the exiled Florentines were every where routed. Numbers, and amongst them Philip Strozzi, were taken prisoners, and sent to Florence, where they were executed; but Strozzi, fearing to be put to the torture, killed himself. Cosmo's authority being thus established, he wanted to marry his predecessor's widow; but the emperor, her father, for reasons of state, gave her to the duke of Parma, by whom she had the samous Alexander Farnese, who succeeded Cosmo, therefore, married Eleanora de Toledo, his father. daughter to the duke of Aiva, viceroy of Naples, and he ever after persevered in his attachment to the Imperialists. In consequence of this connection, Cosmo's power was so firmly established at Florence, that Pius V. bestowed upon him the N'n 4 took up his lodging in the same palace with .m as fuch at The pope rentines ever atinterview was full of mutual expression 2'25 10 . zealous enemy of the king won the heart of his holir Marieil-.o, he furnished the les, subtre send for his niece to Marseilles, J Germany against the his niece is rived, the marriage was celebra Some of the .bardiers. married to festivity of the occasion did no the dake of being transacted. It feems .ted against the pope's be-Orleans. and duke; but, at last, all of convention was entered ir siennese revolted from Charles V. transferring to the du .ne severities practised by his gobeing the most effect ouilt a fort to bridle that city, Henprivate ambition. 1 orted the revolt with a powerful body of children of Fran' imperialists were assisted by Cosmo, and a tion so much not teazing ... out on that account. Peter Strozzi was the ing that c , and was guilty of many excesses against Cofness, the , but at last he was deseated by the count de who commanded for Cosmo. The French king, As fending fresh reinforcements to Sienna, the inhacontinued to make a vigorous defence, while the pope, Fractions, and the duke of Ferrara, interceded in their but all their resistance was ineffectual. A private maty had been made at Leghorn between Charles and Cofme, which the former agreed, upon the reduction of Sienna, to give it up to the latter, by way of indemnification for the great expences which he and the house of Medici had been at in the service of the house of Austria. This rendered Cosmo very active against the Siennese, who would have made a better desence, had they not demolished the castle that had been built within their city by the emperor. The imperial general was Don Garcia, fon to the viceroy of Naples, and brother to Cifnis's wife; and the Siennefe continued so obstinate, that the viceroy himself was about to have taken the command, when he died in Florence. Cosmo's troops, however, blockaded Sienna to closely, that it was reduced to the utmost necessity, and at last obliged to surrender to the emperor, whom the Siennese received not, as formerly, in quality of their protector, but as their absolute sovereign. Charles did not reign long enough to make good his bargain with Colino; but his fon and foccoffer, Phais II. punctually performed it the first year of his reign, by rengning to him all his right and title to the Siennese, in consideration of the attachment of the house of Medir to that of Austria, and to indemnify Cosmo for the ex-pences of the war. This rendered him the most powerful prince in Italy, and he employed all his force and interest in furporting the house of Austria. Amongst other marks of his regard for that family, he instituted the order of the knights of St. Stroken. The original design of those knights was to rainst the piratical states of Barbary, who, about the , infested the coasts of Italy. Philip II. of Spain, ut the year 1562, transferred all the district of excepting that chain of garrisons which is Tde gli Presidii, lying upon the coasts of 's of St. Stephen, who were by that time a ere employed to defend them, and al-Le and church for their residence at Pisa, posses, though the order is now greatly de-, during his life-time, escaped many dangerous s, which were formed against his life by the Flo-, who could not forget that they were once free, and under him they were slaves with gilded chains. His first .ife, already mentioned, was highly ferviceable to him at the court of Spain, and contributed greatly to the glory of his fortunes; but though he had many children, it cannot be faid that he was happy in his progeny, as appears from the following incident, which may be met with in Keysler's Travels, and is countenanced by the relation of other creditable au-

THE names of two of Cosmo's sons were John and Garcias, Tragical The former, when young, was made a cardinal, account of through his father's interest; but never could conciliate to Cosmo's himself the affection or friendship of his brother Garcia, who fons. was known to be of a furious vindictive disposition. One day the two brothers, while at hunting, found themselves alone in following the chace, far removed from all their attendants; and Garcia took that opportunity of quarrelling with his brother, whom he stabbed to the heart with his dagger. then rejoined his company, without discovering in his countenance or manner the smallest emotion, as if any thing extraordinary had happened. The cardinal's horse, however, returning without his rider, the company, by tracing back the prints of his hoofs, discovered the place where John lay murdered. His body being carried to Florence, the grand duke, this father, ordered that the circumstance of his being murdered should be concealed; and gave out, that his son died of an apoplectic fit, while he was hunting. He then ordered the dead body to be conveyed into an inner apartment, and fending for Garcia, to whose malignant disposition he was no stranger, he taxed him with the murder. The youth denied it at first with great warmth, and in the strongest manner; but being introduced into the room where the body lay, it is fait to have bled (very possibly by chance) at his approach. He then threw himself at his father's feet, and confessed the charge. The father, who had resolved on the part he was so so, follownly defired his fon to prepare for death; adding, 2:101 that he ought to account it a happiness that he was about to lose that life, of which his crime had rendered him unworthy, by no other hand than that of him who gave it. He then plucked out of its sheath the dagger with which Garcia had murdered the cardinal, and which still hung by his side, and plunging it into his bosom, he fell dead by his brother's body. This dreadful catastrophe happened in 1562, when the cardinal was no more than eighteen, and Garcia fifteen years of age. The father ordered the facts to be concealed; and all, but they from whom it could not be concealed, believed that the two brothers died of a pestilential distemper, which then raged in Florence. To give this report authenticity, both bodies were buried with great pomp, and a funeral oration was pronounced over that of Garcia. The tragedy, however, proved fatal to the mother, who was so affected with the death of her two fons, that the survived them but a few days. As to Cosmo himself, in all other respects but his family afflictions, he was the most fortunate prince of his age; and, after living in the greatest glory and happiness, he died in 1574, in the thirty-eighth year of his reign, and the fifty-fifth of his age.

Character/ Bur neither the personal glory, success, nor happiness of of Cosmo. Cosmo, nor his fortune in war, nor his high alliances, have rendered his memory to diffinguished as the prodigious encouragement he gave to the study and practice of all the fine arts, which received from him not only patronage, but perfection. In him all the fine tafte, the unbounded generofity, and the discerning spirit of the Medici family, seemed to The immense buildings he began and completed, his incredible collections of statues, ancient and modern, paintings, jewels, plate, precious stones from all quarters of the earth, instruments of every kind, armour, and of every rarity that can be named, would be incredible, had not all travellers in Europe, of any curiofity, seen them; and did not great part of them still remain at Florence. In short, we need not fear to pronounce, that no prince of his revenue ever equalled him as a patron of learning and the arts, unless perhaps we except his ancestor the great Cosmo, the father of his country. But we are to reflect, that in the time of Colmo, the sirif great duke, the arts had arrived at the highest pitch of tafte, magnificence, and perfection, all which was owing to him: and, indeed, it would be not too bold to fay, that he x railed them higher than they had been fince the Augustan age. It the benefactions of some of the caliphs of Egypt, and of Levois XIV. towards the liberal arts, is compared to that of Colmo, he must have the preference, not only because their power and ability exceeded his, but because true architecture, painting, and sculpture, were unknown to the Asiatic caliphs, and because all that Lewis expended did not prevent their declining from the persection in which they were lest by Cosmo.

We have, in speaking of the first Cosmo, conjectured that Page 302. he and his family probably knew certain channels of commerce, which had possibly been lost by the discovery of America; nor is it absurd to believe, that part of the immense sums expended by the great duke Cosmo were furnished by Philip II. whose prodigious returns of treasure, from the discovery of America, were perhaps greater than any European prince ever was master of.

COSMO, the first great duke, was fucceeded by his son He is suc-Francis I. who married Joanna, or Jane, daughter of the ceeded by emperor Ferdinand I. by whom he had eleven children; but his fon the males all died young, and the females were incapable of Francis; succession. His daughter, Maria de Medici, became queen of France by marrying Henry IV. Her public history is well known, as well as that of her father, which may be met with in other parts of this work. The misfortunes which befel her, by her disagreement with her son, were in a great meafure owing to two Florentine favourites, whom the carried with her into France, the marechal d'Ancre and his wife. Upon the death of the great dutchess Jane, who was daughter, fister, aunt, and niece to emperors, Francis fell in love with a Venetian lady of the house of Capello, who was the widow of a gentleman of the house of Salviaii. Having declared his intention to marry her, the senate, out of regard to her father's family, declared her the daughter of their republic, and made her a present of a ducal crown. Francis lived nine years with this lady, who is celebrated for her beauty; but little of importance happened to Florence, or to Tuscany, under his government. He died in 1587, and was succeeded by his brother Ferdinand I. who was a cardinal; but refigned his and be by hat when he was fifty-two years of age. He married the bis brother princess Christina, daughter to Charles II. duke of Lorrain, Ferdi-He had by her almost as numerous a progeny as his brother; nand. but only two of his fons furvived him, of whom the elder, Cosino, was his successor; and the younger, Charles, came to the highest preferments in the church. The most distinguished occurrence in the reign of Ferdinand was the vast magnificence with which he celebrated the nuptials between his niece Mary and the French king in 1600, who had fent him a procuration for that purpose. No expences were spared on this occasion; and the representation of one comedy is faid to have cost him fixty thousand crowns. He died in the . year 1609, and was succeeded by his son Cosmo II. who mar- Cosmo II. ried Magdalen of Austria, fifter to the emperor Ferdinand II. succeeds.

By her he had three daughters, and four fons; of whom the eldest, Ferdinand, succeeded him; and the two next were cardinals. Under this prince, who, like his immediate predecessors, applied himself intirely to domestic affairs, and governed his people with great lenity, the Florentines were happy, and so powerful, that Cosino, without laying any additional tax upon his subjects, in the year 1667, sent an army of twenty thousand men to the affishance of the duke of Mantua against the duke of Savoy. This quarrel being made up by the interposition of other princes, Cosmo gave way to his natural disposition, which was for peace and tranquillity; and he died in the year 1621. He imitated his predecessors in their love for the fine arts, and greatly promoted the building of the chapel of San Lorenzo, begun in 1604, where the great dukes of Tulcany are buried in a mausoleum, which is accounted the most splendid of any in the world, and is said to have cost fome millions sterling. Cosmo II. was succeeded by Ferdinand II. and was a prince of a more active disposition than any of his three immediate predecessors. The disputes about the succession to Mantua reviving, he interposed with his uncle the emperor Ferdinand II. and procured the suspension of the ban of the empire, which was about to have been pronounced against the duke of Nevers, who had strong pretensions upon that succession in right of blood. We shall, in the History of Parma, see with what spirit he supported his brother-in-law, duke Edward. He married Victoire de la Rovere, daughter to the last duke of Urbino, by whom he had two sons, Cosmo III. and Francis-Maria, afterwards a cardinal, and died in the year 1670.

Colmo of bis warriage.

COSMO III. in the year 1661, matried Margaret-Louisa of Orleans, daughter to Gaston duke of Orleans, brother The history to Lewis XIII. Alliances with the court of France, which was at that time in the height of its splendour, were courted by all the inferior Roman catholic princes in Europe, as it intitled them to the friendship of the house of Bourbon. Colme, however, could not have made a more unfortunate match, as a husband: he was intirely under the direction of his mother. the grand dutchess dowager, one of the most severe and austere ladies in all Italy; while, on the other hand, her daughter-inlaw, having been bred up in all the gaiety and licentiousness of the French court, and attended by a numerous retinue of fervants of the same cast, paid very little regard to the remonstrances of her mother-in-law upon the levity of her behaviour; and even presumed, upon the greatness of her birth, to give law to the duke her husband. There seems, however, to have been nothing criminal in the conduct of the young grand dutchels, but her dilagreement with the manners of her husband and her mother-in-law, which had spread the gloom of devotion and formality over all the Florentine court. She resembled him, however, in one particular, that she encouraged men of sense and genius. While she was at Florence, she heard that the famous abbot Siri, who was a monk of St. Benedict, in the abbey of St. George at Venice, had been banished that city, on a strict prosecution, only for having spoken slightingly of the republic. The abbot, repairing to Florence, was presented to the grand dutchess, and she recommended him to his most Christian majesty, who made him his historiographer. But her love of learning, however, could not procure agreement between her husband and her, they being, in other respects, directly the reverse of each other in temper and disposition. The great dutchess dowager, continuing still to have the ascendency over her son, persuaded him to interpose his authority, to prevail with his wife to conform herself to the Italian manners; but neither love nor authority made any impression upon the dutchess: and though she had brought the duke two fons, Ferdinand and John-Gaston, and a princess, Mary-Magdalen, afterwards married to John-William of Neubourg, elector Palatine, daily quarrels happened between her and the great duke; till, at last, they separated, and the returned to Paris, where the was allowed an appointment agreeable to her rank, and which she enjoyed to the day of her death. Though this separation gave disgust to the pride of his most Christian majesty, yet he had at that time political reasons for not resenting it otherwise than by sending instructions to the marquis du Pré, his ambassador at Florence, to apply to the great duke, and to endeavour to effect a reconciliation, as also to insist upon three points. The first was, that the grand duke should, by inviting her to return to Florence, take back his wife; the second, that he should pay her debts, which, it feems, she had contracted to a large amount; and thirdly, that, when the should return, she should have the same power in the management of public asfairs that the duke allowed to his mother. Cosmo answered, with great firmness, that, as to the first request, he was ready His anat any time to receive his wife, if the should pleafe to return /wer to to him; but that her leparating from him being intirely the the Fren refult of her own choice, and without his participation, he amboffawould make no advances towards inviting her to return. As dor. to the second article, he answered, that, while the lived with him, he had always maintained her according to her birth and station; and that, fince their separation, he had ordered her appointments to be punctually paid her, and therefore did not think himfelf, obliged to discharge those debts which the had contracted through extravagance and want of occhomy.

As to the last article, he said, that, as soon as his wise had given as strong proofs of her attachment to his interest as his mother had done, she should enjoy the same authority in public affairs.

THE marguis endeavoured to shake Cosmo's resolution on those heads, by proposing, on the part of his master, another match between his eldest son and another princess of the blood of France, in order to renew the good correspondence between his crown and the house of Medici; but the duke, who was heartily disgusted with French princesses, civilly declined the honour of the alliance; under pretence that his fon was too young to think of marrying. Notwithstanding this, the young prince foon after married the princess Violante Beatrice of Bavaria, a family that was then intirely in the imperial interest. the elector himself being that very year general of the emperor's army upon the Upper Rhine; and prince Clement of Bavaria, his brother, who had been chosen the year before elector of Cologne, having rejected all terms of accommodation with his most Christian majesty. The match of the grand prince into the house of Bavaria, together with the league of Augsbourg, in which Cosmo became a party, discouraged his most Christian majesty from any farther advances towards the court of Florence; and in the year 1697, when the reputation of the French monarchy and arms began to decline, his eldest son having no issue, he married, on the 2d of July, his second son John-Gaston, who succeeded him, to the princess Anna-Maria-Francisca of Saxe-Lawenbourg, widow of Philip-William count-palatine of the Rhine. This lady, besides the splendour of her birth, had great pretensions to her father's dominions, and was, in her own right, actually possessed of a vast fortune. Her father, Julius-Francis of Saxe-Lawenbourg, had died September 29, 1699; but his succession was disputed with his daughter by the houses of Saxony and Anhalt-Brunswic; the first, in right of a reciprocal familycompact between the elector of Saxony and the last duke; and the latter, in right of blood and alliances; while both pretended that a female descendant was incapable of succeeding to that duchy. John-Gaston brought the affair before the imperial courts of judicature, and took a journey to Germany, where he not only carried on the process, but managed the great estates that fell to his wife in Bohemia, by the indisputed rights of heritage from her father. As to the law-process, several precedents were produced, to prove that the estates in question were inheritable by women as well as men; but the forms of the imperial courts retarding the decision, he returned, after a long stay in Germany, to Florence.

NEITHER of the two sons of Cosmo III. having male issue, Obtains and there being but little probability of their having any, the the title of great duke's brother, Francis-Maria of Medici, being of a royal high-vigorous constitution, some years after, was applied to by the ness. court of Vienna to resign the purple, to which he had been raised by pope Innocent XI. in 1686, to qualify himself for marriage. It was generally shought that the impetial court would have bestowed upon him one of the archdutches's daughters, sisters to the emperor Joseph; and it is certain, that the house of Medici was so much in savour at the court of Vienna, that, in the year 1699, the reigning great duke of Tuscany obtained from the emperor the title of Royal Highness, the same having been before conserved on the duke of Lorrain.

Notwithstanding the new title conferred on the His attachgrand duke, it was not immediately allowed of by the powers ment to the of Europe. The count of Lamberg, the imperial ambassador, pope. was the first who, by his master's order, conferred it on Cosmo, in answering the compliments made him by the marquis Vitelli, who had been sent ambassador to Rome from the great duke for that purpose. In the jubilee-year, 1700, Cosmo III. went to pay his devotions at Rome, where he was received by his holiness Innocent XII. with such compliments and caresses as astonished all the world. Every day they were seen walking with one another in the utmost familiarity; and they agreed, that all kind of ceremony should be dropt between them. It is necessary to explain the reason for this, and of some ridiculous incidents that followed.

COS MO III. in his own person, kept up the greatest His deveshew of devotion of any prince in Europe. In his court and tion. attendance his occonomy was next to parsimonious; but he repaired every night to the church of the Annonciada in Florence, and affished at the litanies, which were there sung with the best music in Italy. He was at great pains to bring religious persons to his court, and to recommend them to the pope, who generally bestowed upon them some ecclesiastical preferment. By his interest, cardinal Morigia was raised to the purple; and another religious was made archbishop of Ragufa, on the merit of wearing a long beard. affiduities had endeared him so much to his holiness, that the latter, while he was at Rome, not only gave him the title of royal highness, but prevailed with all the cardinals and foreign ministers, whom he could influence, to do the same: some, however, of the latter stood out, and others made great difficulties; but at last, by the pope's unwearied application, all objections were got over, and the matter was at last considered as being regulated. This important point being gained, the pope and the grand duke became more intimate together than ever; but the people of Rome were inexpressibly associated at seeing his royal highness appear abroad in the habit and dignity of a canon of St. Peter's church. It happened on the following occasion.

He is made Every one knows, or has heard of the holy handkerchief, a canon of which is preserved in the church of St. Peter at Rome, and St. Peter's. which is said to be impressed with the picture of our Saviour's face, as he was going to his crucifixion. The veneration in face, as he was going to his crucifixion. The veneration in which this relick is held is such, that when it is exposed, which is only on very folemn occasions, the people can behold it only at a great distance, and none have the privilege of exhibiting it but the canons of St. Peter's. Cosmo, however, was smitten with so extravagant a fit of devotion, that he employed all his interest with his holiness to have a nearer view of, and to touch, the handkerchief; but was informed, that he could not be gratified, because of the anathemas and fulminations that lie against every man who shall mount the tribunal of the holy relicks, or presume to touch them, unless he is a canon of St. Peter's: he was even told by his holiness, that it was an indulgence the pontifical power itself could not grant. After great consultation, however, his holiness fell upon an expedient that gratified his friend in his darling paffion. The grand duke being then a widower, the pope ordained and declared him a canon of St. Peter's; and his royal highness, in a purple habit, and a surplice on his shoulders, having affilted at the brief which declared him a priest, was conducted to the tribunal, where he had the pleasure of touching and handling the holy handkerchief, with the other relicks; and he bestowed his benediction, at the same time, upon seventy thousand spectators then present. But this was not the only piece of religious foppery that his royal highness was guilty of on this occasion. Upon his holiness presenting him with a few toys and relicks, the duke gave two hundred pistoles to the bearers, and fent the pope prefents to the amount of a large fum in jewels and money. Happening to pray before an altar in a church where his holiness arrived, he crawled upon his knees to the pontifical chair; and when the pope defired him to rise, " Permit, said he, the grand duke of Tuscany to adore the vicar of Christ with that veneration which is due to him."

His adventures at Rome.

His royal highness, however, during his residence at Rome, went only by the name of count Pitiglians, which exposed him sometimes to unforeseen adventures. While he was one day on his knees in church, a lady, whose husband had been banished out of Tuscany, placed herself by him, and applied to him, as count Pitiglians, for his good offices with the great duke to repeal the sentence of her husband's banishment. which he very obligingly promised her. At another time a courtezan threw herfelf at his feet, and, pretending to be penitent, the great duke gave her five hundred crowns to enable her to enter into a monastery. Notwithstanding those weaknesses, which it is hard to determine whether they were real or affected, Cosmo was far from being void of spirit or policy: he had at that time, besides devotion, many important affairs to manage at the court of Rome. The ill state of the king of Spain's health, and the treaty of partition of his dominions that had been made, laid the grand duke under great difficulties: and it was natural, upon the approaching event of his catholic majesty's death, for him to consult with his holiness upon the measures he was to pursue for securing, if possible, the fuccession to his dominions in his own family. With this view, he applied to obtain from his holiness his affent to his brother's refigning his cardinal's hat, and to bestow it upon his son Gaston. He had likewise several quarrels with the Genoese and the Lucquese. The former had come to a resolu- He breaks tion to make la Spetia a free port, which could not be done with the without vast prejudice to Leghorn; so that his royal highness Genoese negociated not only with his holiness, but with all the princes and the in Italy, to prevent the project. He was embroiled with the Lucquese. latter on the following occasion. Two natives of Lucca had been condemned for their crimes to the gallies; but were rescued out of the prison of Pietra Santa, belonging to the great duke, by their friends and relations; for which his royal highness demanded satisfaction from the Lucquese magistracy, who very readily agreed to give all the offenders up to justice. if they could be taken. They found means, however, to. make their escape, and the Lucquese made their apologies to the court of Florence. But they were far from fatisfying the great duke. He had intelligence that the malefactors escaped by connivance, and that forty of them had taken refuge in a castle belonging to Lucca. He demanded, that they should be delivered up to him; and the Lucquese refusing to comply, he ordered all the natives of Lucca in his dominions to be immediately arrested, and put under confinement. Upon this, the Lucquese raised troops, and sent for assistance to their allies the Genoese, which was immediately granted them. Both those differences, however, were made up; the first by the mediation of the dukes of Modena and Parma, and the second by the submission of the Lucquese.

UPON the death of the king of Spain, and the succession of His diffethe duke of Anjou to that crown, the grand duke of Tuscany culties. feeretly resolved to take part with France; but so as to give no umbrage, if possible, to the imperialists. His motives were, Mod. Hist. Vol. XXXVI.

without male issue, might seize upon the succession, as being a fief of the empire; while he might have a chance, as indeed afterwards happened, of treating with the court of Spain, and rendering his dukedom an independent sovereignty. He was, however, under some difficulties with regard to his brother, who was protector both of the Imperial and Spanish interests at Rome, and held very rich livings in the kingdom of Natles and in Sicily. But a branch of the house of Bourbon now fucceeding to the crown of Spain, and that succession being disputed by the emperor, the cardinal could no longer continue the protector of both nations, and must declare himself for one or the other. The pope affected a strict neutrality in the dispute; but as there was little room to doubt that he favoured the French interest, the great duke made no icruple of paying a visit, in his own galley, to the duke of Anjou, who now assumed the title of king of Spain, when he came to Leghern. This visit amazed all Europe, because, till then, his royal highness had been always deemed to be attached to the imperial interest, and its strongest partizan in all Italy. The young king was not instructed how to receive him; and his royal highness was not a little disgusted when his majefly did not, during all the time of the interview, detire him to be covered; a privilege made use of by many grandees of Spain, even without their king's permission. But his brother, the cardinal, having a great reluctance to part with the rich livings he held under the emperor, had a much more difficult task to manage. It would not be very instructive to the reader, to inform him of all the doublings and shiftings of his eminency on this occasion. It is sufficient to say, that he practifed every art to keep himself well with both parties, and by the vaft power he had in the confistory, as well as by the influence he had over his brother, he was long courted by both; and, at last, the French king secretly fixed him in his de Medici interest, by offering to make him cardinal-protector of France, if he should lose that of the empire and of Hungary, But, the French even after the cardinal had come to this resolution, he frequented, as much as ever, the affemblies which the imperial ambassador's lady, the countess de Lamberg, held at her palace; while the cardinal Janson, the French minister at Rome, preffing him to declare himfelf, he ordered the Imperial and Spanish arms over his palace to be covered from the public view, which they were for two months. withstanding his profound dissimulation, he was more than fuspected by the counters, who, by way of raillery, expressed her concern at the umbrage which the French court might take at his frequenting her allemblice; and upon his eminency replying, that the livings he held from his Catholic majesty were too valuable to be thrown to the cocks, she sarcastically told him, that he did right in imitating the princes of his family, who owed, originally, their greatness to their economy. He was forced at last to throw off the mask; and the scaffolding being taken down above his gate, the arms of France and Spain appeared; but, to the no small mortification of the Spaniards, those of France had the right hand. It was thought, at this time, that the match between the cardinal and the archdutchess was far advanced; but being now dropt by his declaring for France, count Lamberg. published a kind of a protest that, as the succession to the Spanish monarchy had devolved upon the house of Austria, nothing done by the cardinal de Medici ought to prejudice the rights of that family. The moderation of the cardinal was fuch, that, instead of resenting this protest, he retired to his brother's court at Florence; and indeed the whole policy of the house of Medici, at this memorable juncture, turned upon giving as little offence as possible to either of the contending parties; and in this they succeeded so well, that they were involved in none of the disputes of those times; but maintained a respectable neutrality with all parties; so that the remaining history of the life of Cosmo III. relates only to bis private affairs.

:utere/t.

By the great economy he observed in his court and palace Great enhe had amassed so much money, that he was looked upon to couragebe the richest prince in Christendom; but his parsimony sub-ment of the jected him to many affronts from the Florentines, who did not dake of fail sometimes to reproach him with the original meanness of Florence his family: his friends, however, excused him, on account to learned of his being obliged to maintain a court for his fon, and another for his brother, and because of the vast sums he expended upon learning and learned men. The vast encouragement he gave to the famous Magliabecchi, with the vast erudition and oddities of that extraordinary person, is well known to all Europe; and it was through Cosmo's interest that the learned cardinal Norris was brought out of an obscure monastery and advanced to the purple. When young he had made a visit to the English court, in the reign of Charles II. but though he always professed a great friendship for the samily of Stuart, yet we do not find that he was very liberal in contributing towards the efforts made for replacing king James on the throne of Great-Britain, though often applied to for that purpose by the cardinal d'Esle, and the other friends of that family; nay, by the pope himself, for whom he had so great a veneration. He affected, however, to be the head and patron of all the Roman Catholics in Great Britain; and

002

Being a complete politician, his success in this was incredible; and it was primarily owing to him that the Papiffs met with such indulgences as they did, even after the accession of George 1. to the crown of Great-Britain. His great study was chemistry; and his friends could not oblige him more than by fending for medicines prepared in his laboratory by himfelf. He entertained at his court the best physicians he could find, and they were consulted all over Europe; and being counted by all the European princes in his time, he may be faid to have been in every respect happy, but in the melancholy prospect of his son, from whom he had no hopes of issue, being the last of his family. This consideration rendered him indifferent as to all the stipulations preceding the quadruple alliance in 1718, by the fifth article of which, the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, were to be accounted for ever as male fiels of the empire, and were to descend, in default of male heirs, to the queen of Spain's eldest son. As the consent of the empire was necessary, the emperor was to use his utmost endeavours to obtain it. Leghorn was to remain a free port, and the king of Spain was to yield to his fon the town Porto Longone, with what he possessed in the island of Elba, as soon as the prince of Spain should be in possession of Tuscany. None of these duchies was to be possessed by a prince who should, at the same time, be king of Spain; nor was the king of Spain ever to take upon himself the guardian-Revoluti- ship of that prince. To alleviate any chagrin which the great duke might conceive at this article, it was agreed, that fuccession of it never was to be allowed, during the lives of the possessions Tuscany. of Tuscany and Parma, that any forces of any country whatfoever, whether their own or hired, should, either by the emperor, the kings of France or Spain, or even by the prince appointed to the succession, be introduced into any garrison, city, port, or town of those duchies. It is not, however, easy to reconcile this with the remaining part of the article; viz. that, for security of the succession, six thousand Swis were to be put into Legborn, Porto Ferraro, Parma; and Placentia.

ons in the

A. D.

1723.

COSMO III. did not long survive this destination of his dominions, for he died the most aged prince in Christendom in 1723. He was succeeded by his son Gaston, whose character and manner of life greatly resembled that of his father. The reader, in the history of Parma, will learn the various events which attended the conclusion of the quadruple alliance, which was exclaimed against by all Italy; and, amongst others, the grand duke Gaston presented memorials against it at the congress of Cambray. By the treaty between the emperor and Spain, who ran into one another's arms in the year 1725, upon king George I. having declined accepting the fole 1725. mediation at Cambray, the emperor granted (without the consent of the empire) the investiture of the dukedoms of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, to the queen of Spain's eldeft fon, in case these dukedoms should be vacant for want of heirs; the determination of king George and the regent of France in the treaty of London, that they are masculine fiefs of the empire, being taken for ganted. Those stipulations Treaty of were enforced by the treaty of Seville in 1728, by the ninth Seville. article of which, fix thousand of his Catholic majesty's troops were immediately to be introduced to garrison Leghorn, Porto Ferraro, Parma, and Placentia, to secure that possession to Don Carlos; and, by the following article, the contracting powers were to use the most effectual means for persuading the dukes of Tuscany and Parma to admit of the garrisons, which, however, were to do nothing to the prejudice of the reigning princes, but to pay them all the honours due to fovereigns in their own dominions. This treaty was guarantied to Don Carlos by Spain, Great-Britain, France, and the states-general; but was complained of by the court of Vienna, as being inconsistent with, or rather a breach of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance; but in the year 1731 the great duke, who had conceived an invincible aversion to the house of Austria, together with his fister, not only ratified all the stipulations with regard to the succession to his dominions, but in consequence of this new treaty, Don Carlos was invited to Florence, there to be educated. Even the emperor at last agreed to the introduction of Spanish troops into the duchy of Tuscany; and this secured the succession of Don Carlos. It is certain, however, that her Catholic majesty. by this time, had projected the conquest of Naples and Sicily for her eldest son.

geror

THE reader, in the history of Parma, will see the progress of the war, which terminated in the emperor's losing Naples and Sicily; and in his fon-in-law, the duke of Lorrain (the present emperor) being named to the succession of Tuscany; while his duchy of Lorrain was annexed to the monarchy of France. The great duke of Tuscany, while those matters were in agitation, was so much decayed in person and inteltects, that he took little or no concern in them; and did not even make any remonstrances against the imperial court, who ordered a body of troops to move towards his dominions, Death of in the beginning of the winter of 1736, to oblige the Spa- the great miards to evacuate his dominions, which they accordingly did. duke. He died in July 1737, and the duke of Lorrain immediately A. D. took possession of his dominions. The queen of Spain, notwithstanding her eldest son was then king of Naples and Sicily, could not bear the thoughts of so noble an acquisition as that of the great duchy of Tuscany being torn from her samily, and endeavoured to engage, but without any effect, the court of Great-Britain to assist her in recovering it for her son the duke of Parma, by offering to engage her husband to relinquish all pretensions to Gibraltar and Port-mahon; and to give the British nation satisfaction with regard to the American differences subsisting between its government and Spain.

Withstanding

BUT as no power in Europe could be jealous of that duke being master of Tuscany, and as such an engagement might have occasioned a tresh war, her proposal was rejected by the British court. Since the accession of the duke of Lorrain, now emperor of Germany, to the great duely of Tuscany, the Florentines have made no figure in the affairs of Italy; but the court of Vienna has taken some steps towards rendering it, in time, a very comfortable appenage for the younger branches of the Lorrain, or rather the Austrian family. In the year 1753 it was resolved, that for the future the entire military force of the great duchy, should consist of only three regiments of foot, and one of dragoons of five hundred men. To support this establishment, a French company offered to farm the revenues of the duchy. But his imperial majesty rejected the proposal, and fixed upon another company, composed of his own subjects, to manage the revenues under the direction of M Richard, a gentleman of Lorrain. By this new inflitution, the finances of the duchy were divided into twenty shares, one half of which his imperial majesty reserved to himself. By those, and other frugal measures, the emperor was enabled to erect a college for the improvement of agriculture at Florence; a science to which the Florentines are peculiarly adapted; and in the year 1755, he raised another regiment of dragoons, and regimented his militia. The duchy is now governed by a council of regency, a military board, and other officers of state, who have made many excellent regulations, by which, during the war now raging in Germany, his imperial majesty has been enabled to draw many useful recruits from the grand duchy of Tuscany, which have done him great service in his armies.

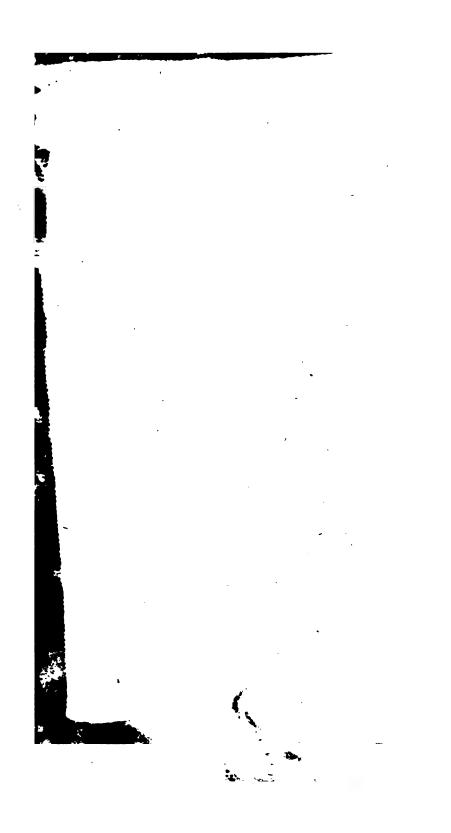

A. D.

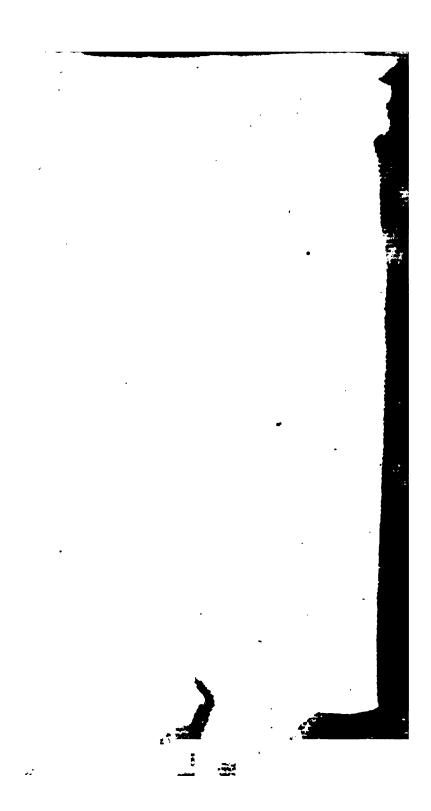

A. D.

1753.

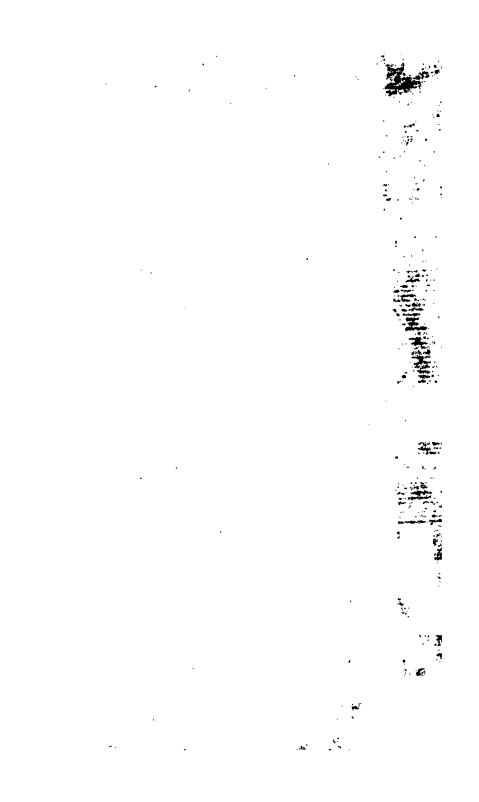

END of the THIRTY-SIXTH VOLUME.

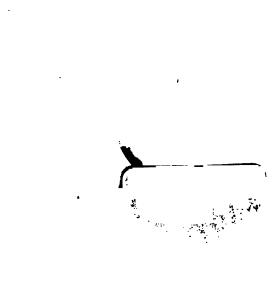

•

•

. . . .

.

•

.

